By Practical Exposition I do not mean Free and Easy Observations, or Pious Reflections, carried 'to' the sacred text, and there suspended on pegs of Scripture Phraseology.

All Scripture-Exposition—inclusive of that which is designated Practical—is, or ought to be, Scripture-Explication. It is, or ought to be, the unfolding and exposing-to-view of the thoughts which had been infolded in the origination of the sacred text.

It belongs to the ideal of such Exposition as is fitly called Practical, to speak directly to the unprofessional intelligence, and as much as possible in the accredited dialect of culture. When thus speaking the Expositor should present to the public, not so much the processes as the results of scientific exegesis.

Men in masses may be expected to take interest in such literature, when men individually succeed in verifying for themselves the contents of the sacred writings, as constituting a message of 'good news' that comes home to every one's 'business and bosom.'

The topic treated by the Apostle in Romans vi, is certainly exceedingly practical. It is hence all the more likely to take us near and nearer still to the heart of our duties, necessities, and privileges. It is full of counsel to which it would be well were all the world to listen and take earnest heed.

There is not much of special literature connected with Romans vi, in the department either of Introduction or of Exposition. The Chapter has, on the whole, been found to be, in several of its elements, somewhat perplexing, though profoundly interesting. Then, unlike Chapters v, vii, and ix, it has not, to any appreciable extent, been turned into an arena of theological gladiatorship. There is scope for a good deal of fresh exegesis.

One charm of the Chapter is imperishable:—Its entire contents are the genuine literary product of the Apostle's own mind and heart. The authenticity of the Epistle to the Romans, like that of the 'perfervid' Epistle to the Galatians, is, by the unanimous verdict of critics, unchallengeable, so that, when we reach the writer's standpoints, we tread the very ground on which the Apostle himself stood, and which he turned into a 'clearing' for our occupation. While we read, and ponder, and reflect, we think some of the choicest of his thoughts.

ST. PAUL'S TEACHING IN ROMANS VI.

V. 1. "What then shall we say?" (Τί οὖν ἐροῦμεν;) A transition-expression, and a debater's phrase. It was a favourite with the Apostle, who alone of all the New Testament writers makes use of it. Here it serves as a logical bridge, by means of which his discursive mind passes into a new domain of discussion.

It is the Ethics of Christianity, or the Doctrine of Sanctification as distinguished from Justification, of which the Apostle is about to treat.

He does not feel that it is in a spirit of loneliness that he enters into a consideration of this great and most practical theme. His enthusiasm is infectious; and he is confident that his readers will go along with him, and surge around him, so that unitedly they and he will have fellowship together. Hence the plural expression ἐροῦμεν.

But the writer is not about to isolate the discussion of the great theme. He is not intending to compose a distinct Dissertation on Sanctifica- tion, which might be thrust into his doctrinal letter. His discussion is to be part and parcel of a larger discussion on Christian Salvation. Hence the illative particle 'then' (οὖν) in the transition-phrase: What 'then' shall we say? It looks back to the discussion that precedes, and on the crest of which the reader is, with the Apostle himself, carried forward to a doctrinal stage, that is clearly in advance of the positions reached in what goes before. In view of the discussion immediately preceding, what, in consistency with logical thought, shall we proceed to say?

Shall it be, "Let us persist in sin that grace may increase?" Shall we say that?

Note the substitution, in our translation, of the hortative expression Let us persist in sin, for the future expression in King James's Version, Shall we continue in sin? There can be no doubt that in the Greek text we should, instead of the future ἐπιμενοῦμεν, read the subjunctive ἐπιμένωμεν. It is the reading of Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, Westcott-and-Hort; and it may be rendered either, according to its deliberative usage, Should we persist in sin? or, according to its hortative usage, Let us persist in sin. The two usages coalesce in substantive import. (See Matt. vi. 31; xvii. 4; Mark iv. 30; 1 Cor. xv. 32.)

It was said in the immediately preceding context that "where sin abounded grace abounded more exceedingly." The sphere of man's sin was encompassed by the vaster sphere of God's grace. While man's sin was exceedingly great, God's grace was still greater. Man's transgression was incalculably multiplied by the formal introduction of the Law (see chap. v. 20); but this multiplication and increase gave occasion to a still greater multiplication and increase of the grace and compassion of God. Well, what now shall we say? Shall we say this, Let us persist in sinning that grace may be multiplied and abound?

V. 2. "Far be it." (Μὴ γένοιτο.) Let aversion to such an idea be accentuated to the utmost degree.

"How shall we, who died to sin, still live in it?" (οἵτινες ἀπεθάνομεν τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ, πῶς ἔτι ζήσομεν ἐν αὐτῇ;))

It is assumed that it may be said of all true Christians, They once died to sin, i.e. in relation to sin. The idea is, that, when they became united to Christ, they died in relation to sin. In becoming united to Christ, they were united to Him in His death. They were, so to speak, absorbed into His personality, and thus identified with Him in His death. His death was theirs. It was as much theirs as it would have been, had they, when He died, been literally members of His body, parts of His person. They get the benefit of His death just as if they had literally endured the dying. Now, when Christ died, He died in relation to sin. He died by it indeed. He also died on account of it. But He likewise died to it; so that, if human sin should or could be regarded as impersonated, it would yet have no farther claims against Him. Viewed vicariously, as the representative of sinful men, Christ was freed, when He died, from farther penal claims on the part of sin. And we, who believe in Him, go back to the same great crisis of His being and die with Him. Hence the Apostle says, we died to sin. It is not a state of sanctification that is described; it is not a daily dying to the seductive influence of sin that is referred to. It is death as the exhaustion of penalty that is spoken of. M. le Cene, though representing quite a host of expositors, is on the wrong lines entirely when he bodies forth, as the purport of the first paragraph of this chapter, the following heading: "The baptised ought to be dead to sin for ever. The new life."

But what is the Apostle's argument? He finds in the fact that we died in Jesus to sin, a reason why we should not continue unsanctified, or, as he expresses it, why we should not "persist in sinning,"—why we should not "live in sin." The force of the reasoning resolves itself into the might of the motive to holiness, which is involved in the fact that the believer in Christ obtains immunity from the penalty of the sins of which he has been guilty. This immunity is under another phase 'forgiveness.' It is forgiveness for the sake of Christ; forgiveness based on the mediatorial suffering of Christ, as its "meritorious cause." It is forgiveness assured to the believer by his union, through faith, with Christ. The might of the moral motive consists in the magnitude and excellency of the blessing that is realised. "We love Him because He first loved us,"—a wonderful and unspeakable blessing. "She," whose forgiven sins are many, "loveth much." The love of Christ, and of God in Christ, "constraineth the believer to live, not to himself, but to Christ." That is to say, it constrains him to "follow holiness," and to run in the way of God's commandments. How then shall we, who died to sin, and whose characteristic it is that we thus died (οἰτινες), live any longer in it? How shall we, who have got forgiveness of sin in so wonderful a way, and at so wonderful a cost, be indifferent in our hearts to the will of God, and give ourselves up to sinning?

V. 3. "Or" (ἤ). It is as if the Apostle were to say, or, let me put the case somewhat differently. There is not much of 'disjunction' in the Apostle's representations, and nothing of 'antithesis.' Hence Luther, and Tyndale, and other translators, leave the particle untranslated. The Vulgate, followed by Erasmus and Beza, translates it by the Latin 'an.'

"Know ye not?" (Ἀγνοεῖτε;) Surely it is the case that ye know. The Apostle is about to make a statement, which he expected to be instantly endorsed by his Roman brethren; and that, not simply out of their confidence in his present teaching, but out of the resources of their previous knowledge in reference to the nature of Christianity and its institutions.

"That all we who were baptized into Christ Jesus," (ὅτι ὅσοι ἐβαπτίσθημεν εἰς Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν,) i.e. who were united to Christ Jesus by baptism. The expression εἰς Χριστόν is not to be rendered, with Oltramare, in Christ; nor, with Meyer, in reference to Christ; nor, with Darby and the Geneva, unto Christ; nor, with Beet, for Christ; nor, with Tyndale, in the name of Christ. Luther and Myles Coverdale give it correctly, into Christ. The phrase is a Pauline idiom, but it simply denotes inward union with Christ, effected through inward baptism. That is the Apostle's idea. He is thinking of such union as qualifies believers of the gospel for affirming, we died to sin; we died, namely in Christ. We needed to be in Christ, in order that in Him we might die to sin. The expression σύμφυτοι γεγόναμεν in v. 5, we have become grown together, makes it evident that the Apostle is thinking of the vital union that subsists between Christians and Christ.

How can such a vital union be effected through baptism? Never through the baptism of water. It is a spiritual union. It is a union that is realisable and realised in, for example, holy and consistent members of the Society of Friends, although they observe no water-baptism at all. It is realised equally in those who are baptised by immersion, and in those who have been baptised under the form of some other mode. It is a union which is not determined in its date by the date of the administration of the outer ordinance. The baptism of water in infancy does not secure its realisation, either then or at any subsequent period of life. The baptism of water, administered in mature life on the warrant of actual faith and conversion, is an anachronism, if intended to secure vital union with Christ. That vital union is, by hypothesis, already secured. It is therefore quite irrespective of outward baptism. It has been realised by the holy in all ages, and under all dispensations. In no age or dispensation has forgiveness or salvation been, in any single case, realised apart from Christ. It is utterly unrealisable except in union with Christ. The name Christ, and the history of Christ, may not be universally known. But they are known to God. And it is on the footing of what Christ is, and did, and does, that the Great Father deals propitiously with men everywhere, and thus makes known, evangelistically, His propitiousness.

When, then, the Apostle says we were baptised into Christ Jesus, he refers exclusively to that spiritual or mystic baptism which has been common to all ages and dispensations, and which is expressly spoken of in Matt. iii. 11, "I indeed baptise you with water unto repentance: but He that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: He shall baptise you with the Holy Spirit and with fire."

The same distinction is implied in what is written in John i. 26, in answer to the question "Why then baptisest thou, if thou art not the Christ, neither Elijah, nor the prophet?" John answered them saying, "I baptise with water: in the midst of you standeth one whom ye know not, even He that cometh after me, the latchet of whose shoe I am not worthy to loose." It is antithetically implied that the Baptist's great successor would baptise with something transcendently superior to water. We read again in the Acts of the Apostles i. 4, 5, that Jesus charged His disciples "to wait for the promise of the Father, which, said He, ye heard from Me, for John indeed baptised with water : but ye shall be baptised with the Holy Spirit not many days hence." There is then, over and above the baptism of water, a spiritual baptism. In its administration there will no doubt be various aims and adaptations. But if a baptismal influence be indispensable for faith, repentance, conviction, conversion, sanctification, then doubtless it will not be wanting in the Providence of God; nor will it be behindhand, when souls are being savingly united to the Saviour.

There is a statement made by the Apostle in his first Epistle to the Corinthians, which casts a clear and steady light upon the passage before us. It occurs in chap. xii. 12, 13 : "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of the body, being many, are one body ; so also is Christ (viz. in His mystic or ideal personality) ; for in one Spirit were we all baptised into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether bond or free ; and were all made to drink of one Spirit. For the body is not one member, but many." V. 27. "Now ye are the body of Christ and, severally, the members thereof."

To be baptised into Christ, then, is to be united to Him spiritually and vitally by that spiritual influence that baptises souls.

"Know ye not that as many of us as were baptised into Christ, were baptised into His death?" The Apostle is throwing light on the expression in the 2nd verse, "we died to sin." Yes, there is 'death' in the case. It was primarily the death of Christ. But secondarily it is the death of all those who are "in Him." For they, who have been spiritually united to Him by spiritual baptism, have been, by their spiritual baptism, spiritually united to Him in His death. Had it not been for His death they would never have been united to Him at all. He came into the world to "give His life" as a ransom. He came into our human nature to "die." He was delivered up by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God that He might "die." His death is the pivot of Christianity. And hence if men are to be in vital union with Him at all, it is fit and meet that they should be baptised into His "death."

V. 4. "We were buried therefore with Him by our baptism into His death." (συνετάφημεν οὖν αὐτῷ διὰ τοῦ βαπτίσματος εἰς τὸν θάνατον.) Very literally, and un-idiomatically, the statement would run thus: "We were buried therefore with Him through 'the' baptism into 'the' death." The two articles, before baptism and death respectively, may, in our English idiom, be fittingly rendered as pronouns. They refer to 'the' baptism and 'the' death, which are specified in the immediately preceding context.

It is to be noted that it is not into Christ's burial that believers are baptised. It is into His death, His crucifixion. (See Gal. ii. 20.)

But the believer's death, like his Lord's, is not an ultimate state or stage. There was to Christ and there is to us, something beyond death, to which we advance. There is much,—much too that is great, and bright, and good. The Apostle, in the striking representation that lies before us, traces the course of our Lord's progressive experience, and of the kindred experience of those who have been baptised into Him.

After death, burial naturally follows. There was burial in the case of our Lord. It was a quiet pause between the pathos of His crucifixion and the triumph of His resurrection. So far as its connection with His decease is concerned, its chief value resolves itself into its evidential relationship. It is evidence of the reality of the death. No mere swoon, such as Bunsen conjectured, no mere lethargy, such as Schleiermacher fancied, had taken place. Christ literally died and was literally buried. But His burial, like His death, was only a stepping-stone to an ulterior condition. While His body was in the grave, and His soul was in Hades—"the world of the disembodied," He looked calmly forth, anticipating translation to the glory that is beyond, and to the "fulness of joy" that is "for evermore." A corresponding spiritual experience is the prerogative of all His people. In the first moment of their faith they are—so to speak—absorbed into the Saviour's ideal personality. They are "in Him" for participation in the decease which He accomplished. "In Him" they "died to sin," and were thus freed from its penalty on the ground of His vicarious dying. Hence, while consciously realizing this marvellous manifestation of Divine goodness and mercy, they can pause a little for contemplation "aft and afore." They are, for a brief space, put apart and "buried with Christ." The spiritual death is past. The spiritual resurrection is about to be. And meanwhile, between the two there is, in the Christian consciousness, the vital touch and feeling of that link that binds into unity an unspeakably momentous past and an unspeakably momentous future. Hence, in the Apostle's actual and practical preaching of the gospel, he went into consecutive detail, and, wherever he unfurled his blood-stained banner, he proclaimed, "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures: and He was buried; and He rose again the third day according to the Scriptures" (1 Cor. xv. 3, 4). That announcement, said he, "is the gospel which I preached" (1 Cor. xv. 1).

"In order that, as Christ was raised from the dead by means of the glory of the Father, so we also might walk-about in newness of life." (ὥςπερ ἡγέρθη Χριστὸς ἐκ νεκρῶν διὰ τῆς δόξης τοῦ πατρὸς, οὕτως καὶ ἡμεῖς ἐν καινότητι ζωῆς περιπατήσωμεν). This is the end intended by God in our union with Christ as regards His death, burial, and resurrection:—that we should walk-about in newness of life. Our Lord's resurrection is rather assumed than directly asserted. But He did rise from among the dead and walk-about. It was newness of life to Him,—a new state and style of life. He was no longer exposed to the penalty of human sin. His agony was past. The whole confluence of sufferings that dragged their slow length along the career of His humiliation, and that finally discharged themselves into His agony, and then into His crucifixion, and thence into the sacrificial surrender of His life when "His heart was broken,"*—all this had passed away for ever. There were to be no more hidings of His Father's countenance behind the accumulated fogs and clouds of human sins. Never again would there be, to the sensibility of His heart, a feeling as of dereliction. The joy of absolute complacency had arisen in His soul, like a sun, and was hasting to its eternal zenith. It was the life of infinite bliss, on which our Lord had, in His humanity, entered. It was "glorification."

Somewhat similar is the new life of believers; only it is but in epitome and miniature. They walk-about in this world as heirs of the world that is to come,—the world of glory. All good things are theirs. They are heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ:—so great, so grand is their heritage. Their very trials are turned into blessings and made to work together for their good. (See Rom. viii. 28.)

The believer's newness of life, as is evidenced by our Lord's newness of life, is not a peculiarity of ethical character, but a peculiarity of personal privilege and estate.

It was by the glory of the Father that the Saviour was raised from among the dead. There was the occurrence of a glorious exertion of power. The power employed was the Father's; though in no such exclusive sense as to debar the co-operation of the Son (John ii. 19): As the Supreme Magistrate of the universal moral empire, the Father was most emphatically well-pleased with the self-sacrifice of the Son. And hence "He raised Him up, having loosed the pains of death" (Acts ii. 24). "This Jesus did God raise up, whereof"—says St. Peter—"we all are witnesses" (Acts ii. 32). "Ye killed the Prince of Life"—said the same Apostle again—"whom God raised from the dead, whereof we are witnesses" (Acts iii. 15). He says again in chapter iv. 10, "Whom God raised from the dead." St. Peter thus agrees with St. Paul in ascribing the eventuation of the Saviour's resurrection to "the glory of the Father."

The believer in Christ, who has realised his union with the Saviour in death and burial, will, without difficulty, or hesitancy, still farther realise his union in resurrection, pregnant, as that resurrection is, with "newness of life" and "joy that is unspeakable and full of glory."

When the Apostle says "we were therefore buried," the "therefore" links the burial to the preceding death, and leaves it to be inferred that there is, in Christian experience, another link in advance that unites to resurrection-life.

V. 5. This is an exceedingly compressed verse. The ideas are crowded and, as it were, crammed together, with the effect of so inter-twisting the phraseology that very careful analysis is required.

The original Greek runs thus, Εἰ γὰρ σύμφυτοι γεγόναμεν τῷ ὁμοιώματι τοῦ θανάτου αὐτοῦ, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῆς ἀναστάσεως ἐσόμεθα.

The For or γάρ indicates that the Apostle desires to confirm the declaration, that it is divinely contemplated that we, who believe in Christ, should walk-about in newness of life. "*For if—*says he—we have become united with Him in death, we shall assuredly be united with Him in His resurrection likewise."

The word σύμφυτοι, grown together, in its relation to περιπατήσωμεν, that we should walk-about, exhibits a marked mixture of metaphors, which a fastidious rhetorician would not unlikely have avoided. The idea, however, is sufficiently transparent. Believers have become grown together with Christ. The translation of the Vulgate is free, si conplantati facti sumus. The Rheims translation is, if we be become complanted; and, accordingly, that of our public English version is, if we have been planted together. The Geneva is, if we be grafted with Him. Tyndale's is simply if we be graft. But σύμφυτοι is rather grown together, than either planted or grafted together. The real idea is, intimately united, so intimately as to be vitaly one. Such is the relation of Christians to Christ. They have become intimately and vitally united to Him in His death. And, says the Apostle, if this be the case, as it really is, then it follows that they shall be also intimately and vitally united to Him in His resurrection. Death without resurrection would be, to Christ, but one-half of the arch of His glory, a fragment riven off and torn from the unity of His mediatorial enterprise. It would be as a hemisphere of impenetrable gloom, with no hemisphere of light and lustre beyond, like day succeeding night, or sunshine after storm. To Christ the resurrection was indispensable, unless death, darkness, and defeat were to be the ultimate condition and fate of the universe. But if resurrection be to Christ an ethical necessity and an assured reality, then its bright and blissful issue will be part and parcel of the joint-heirship of believers. "If they be united to Christ in His death, then they will be likewise united to Him in His resurrection." It is a finely pictorial, or hieroglyphical, and figurative way of saying, that if deliverance from the woful penal effects of sin be assured, through Christ, to those who believe in Him as their Saviour, so will be their admission into participation with Him of the glorious reward of His perfect offering of righteousness.

The Apostle, however, does not simply say, if we have become intimately united with Him in His death, so shall we also be in His resurrection; he introduces the idea of likeness (ὁμοίωμα), and says, if we have become most intimately united with Him in the 'likeness' of His death, so shall we also be in that of His resurrection. It is two distinct representations which he welds together. The one we have been considering; the other is to the effect that if we have become 'like' to Christ in death, so shall we be in resurrection.

Likeness to Christ in death is distinguished from identification. It is a difference in ideal representation. But both views are admirably harmonious with the concrete reality to which they are applied. Believers of the gospel can say of themselves, we died in Christ to sin. Here is identification. But they can likewise say, our death to sin is 'like' the death of Christ to sin. Here is similitude.

There is scope for this representation of similitude. Christ's death to sin was both outward and inward in its peculiarity. It was both physical and spiritual. But the believer's death to sin is inward only, and spiritual. The two representations are not identical, but like. Each of the deaths represented is a death to sin. The real idea is, that for the sake of the death of Christ there is deliverance from the penalty of sin. There is what is equivalent to pardon.

And if there be, then there is likewise something more. There is life, positive life. There is the fulness of bliss in expectancy. There is the inheritance of glory and honour coupled with immortality (Romans ii. 7-10).

The ἀλλά or but, that leads the 'apodosis' of the sentence, is the survival of a fuller representation that had hovered in the mind of the writer: "If we were united with Him in the likeness of His death, that will not be the full extent of the union; but we shall be also united in the likeness of His resurrection."

The future ἐσόμεθα, we shall be, is not intended to be historically predictive. It simply denotes a relation of logical sequence. If union in the death of Christ be postulated, it follows that union in His resurrection may likewise be assumed. He who is sure of the first phase of union has equal reason to be sure of the other.

V. 6. "Knowing this" (τοῦτο γινώσκοντες). The this, the τοῦτο, is prospective, pointing forward to the statements lying on the other side of the verb γινώσκοντες. The participle introduces a clear subjective certainty, that is additional to the assurance that is involved in the hypothetical proposition of the preceding verse: "knowing this that our old man was crucified with (Him)."

(ὅτι ὁ παλαιὸς ἡμῶν ἄνθρωπος συνεσταυρώθη.) By the expression our old man the Apostle means our former self, our self such as we were before conversion. The phrase is relative to the antithetic phrase the new man. See Eph. iv. 22-24; Col. iii. 9, 10. In consequence of this reciprocal relativity of the two phrases, neither of them is strictly applicable or realisable in the case of the unconverted. It is the presence of the new man that turns the other self into the old man. The word old in the phrase does not mean aged; and new is not youthful or young. There are shreds, indeed, of these meanings in the two terms. But the old man is the former unconverted self; the new man is the man that is the present and converted self. The representation must not be pared to the quick. In the Epistles to the Ephesians and the Colossians the will-endowed self-hood of Christian believers is represented as acting, or as having acted, in reference to both the old and the new self-hood, as if there were three self-hoods in the unity of the one personality. But of course the self-hood is only one. And the old and new self-hoods are but the subjective or ideal relativities of the personal unity.

The believer's former self was — says the Apostle—crucified with Christ. The idea is that on the occurrence of faith in Christ, as Christ is revealed in the gospel, a union supervened. The man was taken up "into Christ" so as to be "in Christ." The glorious Being, who was the object of the man's faith, absorbed him into His Crucified Self. Such and so intimate was their union. As far as resultant privileges were concerned, the crucifixion belonged to the sinner as well as to the Sufferer. The man was "crucified with Christ." He was no sharer—so far as consciousness was concerned—of the pangs of penal crucifixion as endured on Calvary. But he enjoyed the immunity, consequent on the exhaustion of the penalty, just as if he had been literally crucified in Christ.

The Apostle says our old man was crucified. The representation is a variation from that which is found in Galatians ii. 20, "I have been crucified with Christ, and I no longer live, but Christ liveth in me." The Christ-element in the life of the Apostle was supreme. But in the passage before us it is not at all the present life of the Apostle or his peers that is referred to. It is the old man who is represented as co-crucified. Crucifixion with Christ is not the antecedent, it is the consequent, of 'saving faith.' There is not, first, conscious union with Christ, and then faith. The order is the reverse of that. It is first faith, and then union with Christ. But union with Christ is essential to immunity from sin's penalty and to the inheritance of glory and honour coupled with immortality. It is not, first, immunity and inheritance, and then union with Christ. It is, first, union with Christ and then immunity and inheritance. It is "in Christ" that we get pardon, justification, and glorification. Hence it is the old man that was co-crucified with Christ. There was no new man till the co-crucifixion was consummated.

But why this crucifixion of the old man with Christ? Why should there be any such union with Christ? What is the grand aim? the "final cause"? Is it that believers of the gospel, attaining the specified union with all its immunities and prospective inheritances, may rest for ever and be thankful? Is it that their self-hood may be filled and gorged with unlimited gratification? Away for ever be the thought! (Μὴ γένοιτο.) Such selfishness would be selfishness in infinite degree. It is an end that would be utterly unworthy of both God and man. And far other was the conception of the Apostle. He explains his teleology thus: "in order that the body of sin might be utterly disabled, so that it may no longer be able to tyrannise over us (ἵνα καταργηθῇ τὸ σῶμα τῆς ἁμαρτίας, τοῦ μηκέτι δουλεύειν ἡμᾶς τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ). Such is God's aim in our co-crucifixion with Christ. The Apostle's representation is highly figurative. He thinks of sin as a tyrant. It rules the sinner with a rod of iron. It is with no gentle hand that it wields its massive sceptre. The tyrant is hard and harsh. The Apostle ascribes to it a body. It is the vehicle of the tyrant's tyranny. All the members are sedulously, unfeelingly, cruelly employed in carrying out his unreasoning and unreasonable will. But it is in vain that expositors debate with one another what this body realistically is. The Apostle is drawing on the canvas of his imagination the picture of a tyrant. He is thinking, for the moment, in the figures of a fertile fancy. Every tyrant has a body of one description or other, and tyrannises in it and through it. But let us not abandon the Apostle's generic idealism for a narrowly specific or individualising representation.

Christianity has to do with this body of sin. The end contemplated in reference to it is that it might be mortally disabled. Hence the co-crucifixion. When the old man is crucified with Christ, the body of sin, as ensphered within him, is transfixed upon the cross. The figures are not drawn with absolute literary nicety and art. The Apostle is not seeking for "the wisdom of words." The old man and the body of sin are in reality, as he draws them, not perfectly identical in character. The new man has special relations to each; and thus, in both cases a difference is involved. There is, however, on either side of the involution the 'promise and the potency' of a grand final result. That is the burden of the doctrinal import. And hence, when the Apostle speaks of the union of believers with the Saviour, a union in virtue of which His immunities and prospective privileges become theirs, the language conveys the assurance that the union will be regulated and dominated by an aim grandly ethical and Divine. The aim is this, that by the might of matchless generosity and loving-kindness on the part of God, the delusive and seductive power of sin may, on the part of men, be broken in their hearts. Men's "sanctification" is God's aim; and His principal ethical leverage within the heart is the noble principle of gratitude for grace received.

Καταργηθῇ. This picturesque term is one of the Apostle's favourites, and is here rendered in the authorized English Version, might be destroyed. In no other author, sacred or secular, is the term wielded with so much zest. It means to render idle, to make inefficient or inoperative, to disable. It reveals that it is part and parcel of the Divine ethical aim to break the power of sin. To the believing, sin is like a crucified tyrant. It may linger on for a period, and, by force of habit, authority may be conceded to it for a limited time; but its power is mortally broken. Soon must it altogether cease to annoy or deceive. It is doomed; and by and by it will be "brought to nought."

Καταργέω is rendered to destroy in 1 Cor. vi. 13; xv. 26; 2 Thess. ii. 8; Heb. ii. 14. It is rendered to abolish in 2 Cor. iii. 13; Eph. ii. 15; 2 Tim. i. 10. Sin will yet be abolished and destroyed.

What henceforward is the relation of believers to the tyrant? The Apostle reveals the Divine aim, "that so we should no longer be in bondage to sin" (τοῦ μηκέτι δουλεύειν ἡμᾶς τῇ ἀμαρτίᾳ). There had been already too much bondage. The tyrant had got his own way too long. And the poor serfs had not had the manliness to strike off their fetters when they had the power. They were willing to be slaves, leading a grovelling life, and refusing to be free. The moral infatuation was profound.

Such was the condition of men everywhere when the Divine Deliverer appeared on the scene. He struck a blow for freedom, that has been, all down through the ages, reverberated in millions of human hearts, and in millions more. He died in the conflict; but He triumphed as He died, and by His dying. He took men up with Him into His death, so that they were co-crucified. And the grand ethical aim of the Great God was that the body of sin might be utterly disabled, so that they should be no longer in bondage to sin.

The category of time must in some respects be merged in the Apostle's representation. The old man was co-crucified. The old man is co-crucified. The union between Christ and Christians was. And it is.

Since the life and death of Jesus have entered into the historical evolution of the human race, there is Divine provision, available to all men, for emancipation from the penalty, as also, and thence, for emancipation from the degradation and folly of sin. Such was, such is, the ethical aim of the Great God. And such is the substrate of import in the verse we have been considering.

V. 7. "For he who died has been justified from his sin." (Ὁ γὰρ ἀποθανὼν δεδικαίωται ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας.) The Apostle reiterates the great evangelical blessing conferred upon the believer—the blessing that carries in its bosom the grand motive power for sanctification. The believer has been justified from his sin. The Apostle's for, or γὰρ, should be noticed. It confirms the immediately preceding statement concerning the believer's privilege. The discourse is dialectically knit together, but not simply with a bare sufficiency of rigidly logical coherence. The writer recurs with epistolary freedom to the details of his theme, and adds ex abundanti link to link.

Ὁ ἀποθάνων, is qui mortuus est, he who died, namely in Christ. See both the preceding and the succeeding context. It is the Christian believer who is referred to. His spiritual hopes repose upon the fact of his union with Christ. And the Christ with whom he is in unison and union is the Christ who died, He is "Christ the crucified." The believer thinks of Him as such; and still as such he thinks of Him, and has faith in Him. Remove, indeed, Christ the Crucified from the believer's faith, and there remains a mere and empty husk of thought. But when the act of faith is present, and likewise the great object, namely, Christ the Crucified, then the conditions are present that warrant the identification, in ethical privilege, of the believer and his Lord. Hence the remarkable expression, he has been justified from his sin: (δεδικαίωται ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας). The idea of liberation is subsumed in the idea of justification. Hence the ἀπό, or 'from.' A similar subsumption is found in Acts xiii. 39: "and by Christ every one who believeth is justified from all things, from which he could not be justified by the law of Moses." The sinner who has—through faith—died with Christ, or who has—through faith—got into union with Christ, is judicially freed from the power of sin to condemn to the endurance of sin's penalty. His title to the inheritance of bliss is, notwithstanding his sins, judicially assured to him. He is judicially vindicated, and thus justified as one having in his possession the "righteousness" which is the sinner's all-sufficient plea. (See Rom. ix. 30; x. 3-8; iii. 21, 22; i. 16, 17.) The old Authorized Version of the memorable affirmation of the Apostle entirely hides out of sight the judicial character of the act that is signalised. It leaves indeterminate the nature of the freedom asserted. Is it the freedom of justification or the freedom of sanctification, to which the Apostle refers? His own Greek leaves no room for doubt. He speaks here of justification, not of sanctification, though of justification as leading to sanctification.

V. 8. The Apostle passes on to look at his fascinating subject from another 'coign of vantage.' Hence the initial δέ is, as Meyer remarks, 'metabatic.' It is transitive, and effects transition. We have no better rendering for it in English than our imperfect but, and this is the rendering given in the Revised Version, replacing the less perspicuous now of the Old Version. Tyndale and the Geneva have therefore; Wycliffe and the Rheims have and; Luther has but (aber); and so has the Vulgate (autem); and so has Myles Coverdale.

“ But if we died with Christ ”—a better translation than that of King James’s Version, if we be dead with Christ. The Apostle views the death of believers as an event, not as a continuous state. But the distinct relations of the category of time are held by him in abeyance. Believers died with Christ, but not necessarily at the historic moment of Christ’s own historic death. Believers died with Christ at the moment when first they were vitally united to Him. They were vitally united to Christ at the moment when they believed the gospel concerning Him. It was then, therefore, that they died. It was then that they became co-crucified. When we speak of believers who are at present on the scene of life, and who have only now, as the spiritual children of a day, or an hour, or of a moment, “ come to the knowledge of the truth ”; then we may say, with reference to the event that has occurred in the crisis-moment of their spiritual experience, they have died with Christ: they are crucified with Christ.

The Apostle, when saying of himself and his brethren, but we died in Christ, does not go back in thought, and date from the historic decease of our Lord, as an event now remote in the area of things past. He only goes back to the epoch of the personal experience of himself and his brethren; and finding that in the consciousness of that experience the clock of advancing time had struck, he does not say we die, except when merely narrating the logical sequence of events, but we died. We died with Christ.

"But if we died with Him, we believe that we shall also live with Him." (εἰ δὲ ἀπεθάνομεν σὺν Χριστῷ, πιστεύομεν ὅτι καὶ συνζήσομεν αὐτῷ.)

The reference is not to the "life" that was terminated by our Lord's death,—the wonderful "life" that was spent on earth amid men's sorrows and sins. It is to the "life" that, succeeding His death, replaced it, burst its bonds, and utterly "abolished" it. The Apostle speaks of our Lord's resurrection-life; and he says that if we were united to the Saviour in His death, we believe that we shall also be united with Him in His resurrection-life.

He employs the future tense, we shall live, because the fact of Christ's resurrection is one thing, and His "resurrection-life" is another. The fact of the resurrection transpired on earth and was the event of a moment. The resurrection-life runs on continuously from age to age, and yet to farther ages of ages. It is to us in the future. It is the object of our hope as long as we live (Rom. viii. 24). It is "reserved in heaven for us" (1 Pet. i. 4); and our prospect is to be "for ever with the Lord." The heavens have "received Him," and will "retain Him,"

“until the time of the restitution of all things” (Acts iii. 21). When the fragile terrestrial tabernacle ceases to be habitable, the emancipated spirit, being “absent from the body,” ascends to be “present with the Lord” (2 Cor. v. 1–12). The holy patriarchs, and all Christian pilgrims who have gone on before, “looked for a country.” “They sought a city which hath foundations, whose architect and builder is God” (Heb. xi. 10, 14). It is there where Christ is; and it is there where believers of God’s gladdening evangel, and just because they give credence to its message of mercy, hope to be. “For,” as says the Apostle, “if we died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with Him.” Divine consistency in mercy is the warrant for the assured belief. The blessing that is conferred, in virtue of union with Christ in His death, would be incomplete and fragmentary without the blessing that is conferred in virtue of union with Christ in His resurrection-life. Our union indeed with Christ, in His death, is security for our immunity from the wages of our iniquity. We died to sin. But this death is only half the blessing required for human bliss. It is merely the arrest and negation of merited penalty. Is there to be no loving-kindness and tender-mercy beyond? No heaven? No glory and honour coupled with immortality? No participation with Christ in the reward of His spotless righteousness and perfect self-sacrifice? Are we not to rise with Christ and soar into "the heavenlies"? Are we not to be "made to sit with Him"? and to "reign with Him"? Are there not "pleasures for evermore" at the right hand of the Majesty, enough for Christ, enough for us too "in Christ"? Does not the full river of God carry water of life sufficient to quench the thirst of every longing soul? The Apostle reasons that if the negative blessing be generously conferred, the positive will not be grudgingly withheld. If in Christ we die as regards the endurance of the penalty of our sins, in the same Christ we shall live as regards the enjoyment of the reward of His righteousness. If in the case of Christ Himself it would be utterly unnatural to break off abruptly the sequence of resurrection-life from the crisis of His atoning death, not more truly incomplete and unnatural would it be to render us participants in our Saviour's death while withholding from us participation in the glory of His subsequent life. There should be consummation as well as commencement. Christ should be to us, in the matter of our spiritual experience, omega as well as alpha.

V. 9. "For we know." (εἰδότες.) It is as if the writer were to say—yes, we shall continuously live with Him, subject to no fears of interruption to the life that is lived, “for we know that Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over Him.” It was fitting that He should die. He came into our dislocated human world that He might suffer in the friction and die. From the moment that His Divine consciousness dipped down into, and blended with, His human consciousness, He saw looming in the distance the tokens of absolute self-sacrifice. His heart beat funeral marches toward a goal of endurance, that could not be farther postponed, or longer sustained. It was the climax of innocent suffering, and will never be repeated. Christ being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death has no farther claim on His endurance; it has dominion over Him no more. What then is our prospect? We shall see.

V. 10. “For in that He died, He died unto sin once; but in that He liveth, He liveth unto God.” (ὁ γὰρ ἀπέθαιεν, τῇ ἀμαρτίᾳ ἀπέθαιεν ἐφάπαξ.) The ὁ is, of course, the accusative of the relative pronoun, although it is peculiarly and emphatically tilted up at the commencement of the sentence. For what He died, that is, for the thing which He died, and that is, for the death which He died. The Greeks, like the English, could speak of living a life, and dying a death. The relative pronoun in the Apostle's conception is, notwithstanding the absence of the anticipative μέν, oppositive to the ὁ δέ in the next clause. For the death which on the one hand He died, He died to sin; but the life which on the other hand He lives, He lives to God. The Saviour's death indeed was a death by sin; but that, as we have already seen (v. 2), is not the Apostle's idea here, nor does he here mean that the Saviour's death was for sin or on account of sin. His idea is this—Our Saviour died 'to' sin; and He thus died once for all. The conception of sin as a tyrant is still looming over the mind and heart of the writer, and swaying his representation (see v. 6). The tyranny of sin is the oldest of all the tyrannies; and the direst. All men have suffered severely in consequence. They have been ruthlessly misused as serfs and slaves, and beasts of burden (Matt. xi. 28). The degradation that is the effect of sin is immeasurable; correspondingly incommensurable is the woe. Hence the compassion of God, and the mission of the Saviour. When the Saviour came into our nature, and became, as far as might be, our Surety and our Substitute, He was at once rough-handled by our tyrannous sin. He was "wounded for our transgressions;

He was bruised for our iniquities." "He was oppressed and He was afflicted." "His visage was marred more than any man, and His form more than the sons of men" (Isa. lii. 14; liii. 5, 7). It was as if blood-hounds had been let loose on Him. The leash of the blood-hound-spirit was let slip. Our Saviour was truculently hunted down as one not fit to live. He died. But in the very act of dying He conquered and triumphed. For He did not merely die. He died 'to' sin. He died 'to' the sin that sought to murder Him. By His death He became free from all farther inflictions on account of sin, and all liabilities of the nature of woe. He became free for ever from all farther contact with sin's tyranny or penalty. The idea of freedom is ineradicably inherent in the representation. Christ entered into a far higher plane of freedom than what is described by the patriarch Job, when he says of the state of death—"There the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary be at rest; there the prisoners rest together; they hear not the voice of the oppressor; the small and great are there: and the slave is free from his lord" (iii. 17-19). The freedom, into which Christ was introduced when He died to sin, was, unlike the freedom described by Job, realised in consciousness; and was and is available to all, who, groaning under degrading servitude, are willing and eager to be free. The freedom thus obtained is for perpetuity. Its "meritorious cause" is indiminishable in merit; and hence, as well as for other reasons, "the death which Christ died, He died once for all."

It is on a different but affiliated line of representation that the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews says, "By His own blood he entered 'once for all' into the Holy Place, having obtained eternal redemption" (chapter ix. 12).

The Apostle, turning to the other side of his subject, says, but the life which He is living, He is living to God (ὁ δὲ ζῇ, ζῇ τῷ Θεῷ). The death signalised in the preceding clause was a momentary event; the contradistinguished life is a thing of continuity. It has been, and is, and will be; running on from age to age. It is Christ's resurrection-life (see verse 9). He is living it to God. Although it is the case that He really died and was dead; yet it is likewise, and as really, the case, that He is alive, and alive to God. In the life, which He lived in our nature before He died, He was doomed to die. Death was imminent all along His career. It impended, loweringly, over His head and heart. He was unavoidably obnoxious to it. Having clothed Himself in the garb of our humanity, He had to suffer in it on account of our human sin. There was no alternative, if salvation was ever to be achieved and enjoyed. Hence He patiently endured the appointed suffering, till it culminated in the endurance of a violent death, to which He succumbed on Calvary. In the article of that death, He drained to its dregs the bitter cup of human liability on account of sin; and having drained it, He died. He "tasted death for every man" (Heb. ii. 9). In dying, He died, not to God, but to sin: He was freed for ever,—not from God—but from sin and from all judicial exactions on account of sin.

Hence He lives. Not indeed to the tyrant sin, to be exposed to those tyrannous inflictions which are in accordance with the very nature of sin and tyranny. He lives a far other style of life. He lives to God. Cognizance is taken of him in the conscious observation of God, who knew the end from the beginning, and who in truth raised Him up from among the dead; and was thereupon ready to deal with Him, and act by Him, in accordance with his peerless Messianic and Redemptive deserts.

Within the sphere of the life that preceded His death, Christ had to do with the liabilities of sin. But within the sphere of the life that succeeded His death, His resurrection-life, He had and has to do with the fruition of those rewards of righteousness which it is joy to the heart of the Righteous Ruler of the universe to confer.

In the expression, alive to God, it is not the Saviour's ethical character that is described. It is the fact of the continuance of His mediatorial life. Though He died and disappeared from the observation of men; yet death did not end Him, nor did it hide Him from God. He rose into "newness of life," and lived on with God. He lived and still lives to God. If there be non-believers and disbelievers to whom He is Nothing, and who consequently care for none of His things, the loss is theirs. They are coming, in consequence of their culpable ignorance, into collision with realities which are as stable as the foundations of the Universe. Christ, though dead, is living. Yea, He is living because He died. He is living His resurrection-life. God is taking cognizance of Him and rewarding Him with the "fulness of joy," that is reached by "the path of life" (Psa. xvi. 11). Our Saviour is thus living to God, because He died to sin. He has been exalted into the highest glory of "life eternal," because, though "being in the form of God, He counted it not a prize to be on an equality with God, but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men; and, being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea the death of the cross." (Phil. ii. 6, 8).

V. 11. "So" (Οὕτως). A spiritual parallelism is opened up to the mind of the writer. "Reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed to sin, but alive to God through Jesus Christ our Lord" (καὶ ὑμεῖς λογίζεσθε ἑαυτοὺς εἶναι νεκροὺς μὲν τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ ζῶντας δὲ τῷ Θεῷ ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ). Do ye, on your part, reckon yourselves. There is a parallelism between the spiritual state of Christ and the spiritual state of those who are vitally united to Him (see ver. 5). The Apostle deemed it a matter of moment that they should realise the fact. Christ on His part died to sin and lives to God. Do ye on your part—says the Apostle exhortingly to his brethren—consider yourselves to be dead to sin, and alive to God in Christ Jesus. Their state—in virtue of their union with Christ Jesus—was pre-eminently one of privilege; and the Apostle desired that they should realise it as such. Their sanctification to a large extent, depended on the realisation.

Consider yourselves to be dead on the one hand to sin, and alive on the other to God, in Christ Jesus. The expression in Christ Jesus conditions both of the preceding clauses, and not merely the latter of the two, as Rückert and Köllner suppose. It is in Christ Jesus that we are dead to sin, just as really as it is in Him that we are alive to God.

In Christ Jesus dead to sin! In what respect?

Not, as has been too often supposed, in respect to character or ethical demeanour. What then? In respect to freedom from penal liability. The state described is indeed a stepping-stone to an all-important result in character. But it is not itself that result. It is in Christ Jesus that believers are dead to sin, because it is in virtue of their connection with Him by faith, that they are in such a state of union with Him, as regards His meritorious death, that the immunity from future suffering for sin, which is His by desert, becomes theirs by grace. The word dead is in the Apostle's expression, because of the peculiar significance of the death of our Lord in the great economy of salvation. The very essential principle of the Gospel is that Christ "died for our sins and rose again" (1 Cor. xv. 3, 4). "In due time Christ died for the ungodly" (Rom. v. 6). "God commendeth His love toward us in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. v. 8). "We are justified by His blood" (Rom. v. 9), and, "We were reconciled to God by the death of His Son" (Rom. v. 10). "I," says our Lord, "if I be, lifted up from the earth will draw all men unto me; this He said signifying what death He should die" (John xii. 32, 33). No wonder therefore that the Apostle so manipulated and moulded his phrases that he inserted the word 'dead' into one of the most significant of them. Believers are warranted and encouraged to "reckon themselves to be dead to sin." They are thus to reckon themselves "in Christ Jesus"; and it is because of His singular self-sacrifice in taking the place of the guilty, and stooping to the abasement of death, even "the death of the cross" (Phil. ii. 8), that there is "in Christ Jesus" deliverance from the fatal "wrath that is to come."

"And living to God" (ζῶντας δὲ τῷ Θεῷ). This is not something in antithesis to the statement in the preceding clause. And hence, in our English idiom, it is preferable to connect the two statements with the conjunction and, rather than with the somewhat oppositive but. They who are dead in relation to sin are, for that very reason, not absolutely dead, but alive or living in relation to God. Death in relation to sin is entirely consistent with life in relation to God. The one relationship is complementive of the other. And both are charged with mighty moral motive-power, constraining to holiness of conduct and character.

When the Apostle says, reckon yourselves 'alive' he does not think of life apart from Christ. It is "life in Christ Jesus" of which he speaks, and which he desired his disciples to realise. "If," says he, "we died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with Him." It is Christ who is our life. He and He only is the living "Meritorious Cause" of our bliss.

When speaking of the relation of Christ to life, we might refer either to the life which He lived before His death,—a life of ineffable goodness and ethical glory; or we might refer to the life which He has been living since His death,—a life of incommensurable exaltation in glory and honour. It is to this latter life, the award of the Father to the Son, and thence the gift of the Son to the multitude of His 'brethren,' that the Apostle refers. The life spoken of is the life consequent on the Saviour's crucifixion. Let all Christians reckon themselves as its participants. God takes note of the vital interlinking relationship, and acknowledges its validity. And hence it matters little that some men deny the reality of the life, "hid" as it is "with Christ in God." God owns it; and its beneficiaries enjoy it. No amount of confident denial, or subtle reasoning, or bitter scorning, or cruel persecution, or obloquy, can deprive them of that of which they are conscious.

If the disciples referred to had been 'dead' in relation to God, instead of 'alive,' the case would have been far other and lamentable. They would have been destitute of the power of reciprocity that is needful in order to take advantage of Divine blessings.

But not only is God Himself in His essential nature, the living God who has life in and for Himself; He also has had, and yet has, and ever will have, "life" to give. He had it to give to His Son in infinite plenitude. "For as the Father hath life in Himself, even so gave He to the Son also to have life in Himself" (John v. 26). The Son has received as the Father gave, and hence the life that is in Him is all-sufficient, in plenitude, for the life of men. God the Father gives, and God the Son too. The "fulness of the Godhead" is in the Son, in order that "out of His fulness we all may receive grace for grace." Hence, "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life" (John iii. 16). They who have the Son "have life," and are "alive to God." Whatever they may be to men around them, however ignored and spurned as Nobodies or as "Things that are not," still before God they live, and will live for ever.

The thought of such inestimable privilege should not be stowed away into the dim recesses and unconsciousnesses of the mind. Contrariwise, the blessings involved should be held forth to catch and reflect the clearest sunlight that can get admission into the human intelligence. The benefits are fraught with remarkably transformative moral potency,—potency that can turn the whole manhood of a man into “a new creation,” and convert his surroundings, far as his ethical influence extends, from a waste state of wilderness and weeds into a scene of beauty, budding all over, and blossoming “like the rose.” In other words, there is provision for “the beauty of holiness” in the experience of all who, through faith in the Gospel, take home to their hopes and their hearts the blessings of pardon and eternal life.

V. 12. “Let not sin then reign.” The inferential conjunction ‘then’ turns back the attention to the scope of the preceding discussion; and fittingly introduces the cardinal subject of “sanctification,” in its logical sequence to the subject of the lofty privileges as to state, which are assured to those who are “in Christ Jesus.”

“Let not sin reign.” Sin is again personified (ver. 6), and represented as a sovereign. It cannot sway its sceptre, however, without the consent of the manhood of the man. That manhood may, in self-degrading folly, vote sin into the throne of its being. Or, it may dethrone the usurping tyrant, and come under the sway of a reign, at once most righteous and most benign. A reign, however, of one kind or another there must be. Every man, whether he think it or not, must be subject to some regnant principle and personality. But having free-will, man may choose his king. Hence the Apostle's exhortation, Let not sin reign.

There is no latent antithesis between reigning and existing. The antithesis that is subtended is between the reigning of sin, and the reigning of righteousness or of the righteous God. It should be noticed that the imperative μὴ βασιλεύτω, let it not reign, is addressed grammatically to sin, but in doctrinal import to the believer.

"In your mortal body." This is the domain of the royal ruler, whoever he may be. There is significance in the word "mortal." It indicates that "the time is short," and it would therefore be folly and a shame if it were to be wasted and squandered.

"In the body." The Apostle did not forget that it might be said to all believers, "Having therefore these promises, beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement of flesh and spirit; perfecting holiness in the fear of the Lord" (2 Cor. vii. 1). Still he had, in accordance with a profound physiology and philosophy, strong ideas in reference to the mighty influence of the body on the spirit. In some respects the spirit nobly dominates the body; in others the body rudely thrusts itself into the foreground of influence, and the spirit, instead of dominating, is ignobly dominated. The 20th verse of the 6th chapter of the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians runs thus in our public English version: "Ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's." But in the more correct text, given by the critical Editors, and accepted by the Revisionists, the exhortation runs thus: "Ye were bought with a price: glorify God therefore in your body." Far-reaching ethical results are determined by the body. Hence the Apostle's entreaty in a succeeding part of the Epistle to his fellow-Christians in Rome, "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, to present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, and acceptable to God, your rational service" (xii. 1). If the body be laid upon the altar of consecration, the 'informing' spirit will not be withheld. If sin be not allowed to reign in the body, there is but little likelihood of its iron sceptre being revered in the spirit.

εἰς τὸ ὑπακούειν ταῖς ἐπιθυμίαις αὐτοῦ. It is impossible to render these words literally into English. "There are," says Dr. Jelf, "even in classical writers, slight beginnings of the tendency which we find fully developed in the Greek of the New Testament, to confound the notions of the aim, the cause, the result, and the infinitival object of a verbal notion, on the ground of their common property of following more or less closely on the verb, and their being dependent thereon" (Gk. Gram., § 803). The Apostle's idea might be represented thus:—"Let not sin reign in your mortal body, unto this being the effect, that ye obey its lusts." The lusts referred to are not the lusts of sin, but the lusts of the body (αὐτοῦ). They are the inordinate desires that are experienced in consciousness, in virtue of physical peculiarities interpenetrating in their effect the region of the mind. Such desires, unfed and unfanned, are not sinful. It is not sinful for them to be. Their existence is beyond the sphere of free-will. Sin begins when they are no longer controlled, restrained, denied. When not inordinate they are easily guided and are potent for good. When inordinate, and therefore "lusts," or, as the French say, convoitises, rather than simple desires, they are the wild animal in our nature, and need the strongest reins of reason and conscience laid upon their neck. It is reversing the order of nature and of God for the man to obey the lusts; the lusts should be obedient to the man.

V. 13. "Neither present your members to be weapons of unrighteousness to sin" (μηδὲ παρ- ιστάνετε τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν ὅπλα ἀδικίας τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ).

The Apostle's figurative representations are somewhat mixed; but they are emphatically graphic. He does not work out complete pictures, but contents himself with a minglement of hints and suggestions, not rhetorically rounded off by the help of "the wisdom of words."

In the preceding verse he had, in an earnest hortatory spirit, lifted up a warning voice against the reign of sin. Let not sin reign in your mortal body. In this verse he retains the conception of sin as a regnant principle. He likewise assumes that it is actually engaged in warlike operations. It fights for its throne: and is intolerant of opposition. The spirit of a tyrant is in it. Hence it seeks military submission on the one hand, and military subsidies on the other. But, says the Apostle, present not your members as weapons of unrighteousness to sin.

In the preceding verse the mortal body is represented as the domain over which the reign of sin may be extended. In this the members of the body are regarded as weapons which may be wielded in battle, either on the side of righteousness against unrighteousness, or on the side of unrighteousness against righteousness. Put them not, says the Apostle, at the service of sin.

The word members, so far as enumeration is concerned, would, to the writer's mind, be somewhat indefinite. The right eye would be thought of, and the right hand; the mouth also; and the tongue, and the throat—so often an “open sepulchre”; the feet likewise, which may be swift to convey either to the right place or to the wrong. The hand may be lifted up either to smite down defiant wickedness, or to shed innocent blood. Men may with their tongues either use deceit or plead the righteous cause of the widow and the fatherless. The eye may roam in wantonness, or gaze in rapture on both heaven and earth.

Take into account all the members of the body, and every man's character may be determined by the use that he makes of his physical organism. Use it not, says the Apostle, in the service of sin. Assist not the tyrant to intensify his tyranny.

“But present yourselves to God as alive from the dead, and your members to be weapons of righteousness to God.” (Ἀλλὰ παραστήσατε ἑαυτοὺς τῷ Θεῷ ὡς ἐκ νεκρῶν ζῶντας καὶ τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν ὅπλα δικαιοσύνης τῷ Θεῷ.)

In the preceding clause the Apostle dissuades: in this he persuades. In the sphere of the former his representation is negative; in this it is positive. The two clauses are mutually complementary.

Present yourselves to God. There is a peculiarity in the hortatory imperative. It is 'aoristic' in tense (παραστήσατε); whereas in the antithetical clause the tense is 'present' (παριστάνετε). The force of the two imperatives might be thus represented: "Neither be ye presenting your members to be weapons of unrighteousness to sin; but present yourselves at once to God." Make no delay. Let there be no indecision. If already there has been the least wavering, let there be not a moment longer of hesitancy. Put yourselves instantly at the service of God. Tender yourselves, enlist in His military service, and go in bravely to take part in the "holy war" for the overthrow and destruction of sin.

As alive from among the dead; that is, as partakers of the resurrection-life of Christ. The Apostle calls upon his brethren to appear before God for service, under their true colours, and in their true character, as they really were. They were actually, by means of faith, united to Christ. They had been united to Him in His death. They were now united to Him in His subsequent life, and are heirs with Him of all the blessings and the glory that belong to that life. Their fellow-men around them might not recognise the reality of such a glorious union. But God recognised it. To Him, as well as to themselves, it was real. To His all-seeing eye, as well as to their own self-conscious faith, they were alive from among the vast masses of the dead. In their every-day experience they had earnestness of the grandeur of their destiny. It well became them, therefore, to be lifted up into a lofty mood of gratitude, and thus to consecrate ungrudgingly their most devoted and loyal service to their infinite benefactor.

Instead of the expression ὡς ἐκ νεκρῶν ζῶντας, the important uncial manuscripts \aleph ABC read ὡσεὶ ἐκ νεκρῶν ζῶντας, and the reading has been approved of by Lachmann, Tregelles, Tischendorf (8th ed.), Alford, Westcott-and-Hort, and introduced into their respective texts. It was the reading which Theodore of Mopsuestia had before him. If it be genuine, then the idea will be as follows: "Present yourselves to God as if ye were alive from among the dead." It would be suggested that they had not been literally among the "dead," and that they were not now in literal union with Christ in His "resurrection-life." They were indeed, as regards privilege and prospective glory, one with Christ. But the union was ideal. It was only as if they had been literally "alive from the dead."

We are not disposed to accept ὡσεὶ as genuine. Not only is it the case that ὡς has a great preponderance of MS. authorities on its side; it has a still greater preponderance of patristic support. It should also be borne in mind that though ὡσεὶ occurs frequently in the New Testament writings, it never occurs in the Epistles of St. Paul. And then, what is of very special consideration, it is more likely that a transcriber, untrammelled by strong views of verbal inspiration, should change ὡς into ὡσεὶ, than that he should change the uncommon ὡσεὶ into ὡς. A transcriber, if not dipping deep into doctrines, might be excused if he found it easier to grasp the suggestion of a rhetorical comparison, than to interpret the assertion of an ideal reality. We believe that the Apostle said, "present yourselves to God as being really—in Christ—alive from the dead."

The Apostle is not contented with the generic exhortation,—Present yourselves to God as alive from the dead. He adds specifically, and your members to be weapons of righteousness to God. He gives prominence once more, in the spirit of plain speaking, to the constituent organs in the organism of the body. A man's character is determined by the use that he makes of these organs or members. They are the mediums through which he can operate on the world at large, and upon his fellow-men in particular. By means of them he may do good; by means of them he may do evil. God who "worketh hitherto " is engaged in a great work. He is engaged in a conflict too. He is the "God of Hosts," "mighty in battle." Confronted as He is by legions of defiant free-wills, it is befitting that He muster and marshal His co-operative forces to strike the blows that are needed to put down sin and to establish righteousness on the earth. Hence it is likewise befitting that all who have it in their hearts to be on the side of God, should make tender to Him of their militant service. Their various outer members, actuated by their various inner faculties, are the weapons of warfare that are needed. Only let heed be taken that they be wielded in the campaigns, and according to the behests, of the Infinite Will; for then only are the arms of precision " weapons of righteousness."

When analytically reading the words, and your members to be weapons of righteousness to God, we are mentally to carry along with us the verb παράστήσατε. The idea is not that the weapons are arms of righteousness to God. It is that, as such arms, they are with the soldiers who wield them, to be put at the service of God. Thus they are to be tendered, or proffered, or yielded, or yielded up, or given, or given up. In these different ways has the verb been here rendered.

V. 14. The Apostle proceeds to enforce the injunctions of verses 12 and 13. "For sin shall not have dominion over you" (ἁμαρτία γὰρ ὑμῶν οὐ κυριεύσει). The idea is, for sin shall not 'lord it' over you. Even your own sin, accomplished reality though it is, shall not be able to 'lord it' over you. In general, when sin becomes an accomplished reality, it is exceedingly lordly in its treatment of the sinner. It does not spare the leaded lash. Under the dominion of sin, penalty seizes hold of the infatuated sinner; and "the way of the transgressor is hard." The result is that a spirit of recklessness is apt to come over the guilty soul, and the man plunges deeper and yet deeper into abysses of immoral indulgence and retributive degradation.

But, says the Apostle, facing his Christian brethren and realising the munificence of bliss that is available to them in Christ, "sin shall not 'lord it' over you." He does not here mean, ye shall cease from sinning. Such words indeed are applicable in a very real import to all true believers in Christ. But they are not applicable to them at this particular juncture of the Apostle's reasoning. He does not mean, Yield not yourselves to the militant service of sin, for ye shall be holy. The Apostle does not thus stand still in thought, and then simply turn round. He holds out to his brethren in Christ a large inducement, by way of motive, to constrain them to abandon unreservedly the militant service of sin, and to enlist devotedly in the militant service of God. The inducement is the double fact of (1) a holy immunity from the retributive consequences of their sins, and (2) a free 'enfeoffment' in the inheritance of that everlasting bliss, which is the peculiar reward of righteousness—an immunity and an 'enfeoffment' which are the peculiar prerogatives of believers in Christ. "Sin shall not lord it over you." This prerogative when realised appeals powerfully at once to the gratitude and to the moral admiration of the soul.

The Apostle proceeds, in the remainder of the verse, to explain how it is that sin, even when an accomplished fact, is not able to 'lord it' over those who believe in Christ—"for ye are not under law, but under grace."

In one obvious sense all men, inclusive of believers in Christ, are under law (ὑπὸ νόμον). The law has authority to say to them, without any exception or distinction, Do this; whosoever thou art, obey my precepts. The law is, in this respect, the voice of duty.

In like manner it may be legitimately said that all men, inclusive of the unbelieving, are under grace. "The grace of God hath appeared, bringing salvation to all men" (Tit. ii. 11). It brings salvation within the reach of every man, though it forces it upon the acceptance of no man. It thus over-arches with a possibility of glory the whole world, full as it is of wayward free-wills.

Still there is enjoyed by believers some great peculiarity of privilege, as regards both law and grace, in which unbelievers cannot, while remaining unbelieving, be participant. Believers are not under law inasmuch as law does not say to them,—Do thy duty 'and live'; do it 'or die.' And again believers are under grace in this peculiar respect, that God is graciously pleased, in consideration of the atoning work of Christ, to grant them the plenary remission of the penalty of their sins, and to constitute them heirs of the glory and excellency of everlasting life.

In the presence of such grand peculiarity of prerogative and privilege, it is not to be wondered at, that sin should not be able to 'lord it' over believers in Christ Jesus. And if they realise this disablement of their great enemy, great will be their responsive gratitude and self-consecration. Great 'should be' their sanctification.

Some might suppose that the expressions under law and under grace should be interpreted as having reference to a sequence of general or world-wide dispensations, which run parallel with the ages. The dispensation of law would, on this hypothesis, be regarded as having its centre in

Judaism, while its circumference would stretch out indefinitely till it embraced all peoples everywhere,—all peoples who were bearing on their consciences a yoke, more or less like the ‘legality’ of Judaism, and consisting largely of stringent and oppressive rites and ordinances (Gal. iv. 1–11). It would then—in harmony with the world-wide interpretation proposed—be contended that “in the fulness of the time,” the ritual dispensation was, as a matter of historical fact, superseded by the sunnier dispensation under which we all now live, the Dispensation of grace.

This chronological view, however, of the dispensations of law and grace is not the framework in which the Apostle’s representation is set, in the passage before us. He is not thinking imaginatively of a time, on the one hand, when there was law in our human world, and no grace. Nor was he thinking on the other of a different time when there is grace and no law. It is not on successive ages and their ethical specialties that he is meditating. His view is more immediately practical. He is thinking of what transpires in the experience of individuals.

To each of his readers he is in substance declaring, Thou art the man whom I mean. When he says “sin shall not ‘lord it’ over you,” he draws attention to a peculiar ethical deliverance, which, if eventuating at all, must happen within the consciousness of the individual believer. Sin, says he, shall not lord it over you Roman believers. But sin did 'lord it' over all Roman unbelievers. And sin still 'lords it' over all men everywhere who are unbelievers. In all ages sin has been lording it over unbelievers. In all ages sin is unable to 'lord it' over believers. During the Dispensation of Judaism, it was believers only, whether Jews or Gentiles, who were freed from the lordliness and tyranny of their sins. During this present Dispensation of grace, it is believers only, whether Gentiles or Jews, whether Greeks or Romans, whether bond or free, who are freed from the lordship of the law (Rom. vii. 1; Gal. v. 18), and who are overarched with the grace of actual forgiveness, and acceptance, and justification, and "eternal life." You, says the Apostle to his Romans, are emancipated from the lordship and lordliness of sin, because you are, since your faith in Christ, no longer under law but under grace.

The law exacts; it does not give. Grace does not exact; it gives. The law, pure and simple, demands the uttermost farthing of obedience and the sum total of all possible righteousness. It demands, and threatens if its demands be not complied with; but it gives not, even to the minutest fraction, relaxation of obligation or remission of penalty. The law is not gracious, for it is not grace. Grace is gracious. It is liberal and generous in all its spheres. It has given Christ "unto all," to be available to all, that He may be available as "all their salvation." Such is its liberality in its vastest, its all-comprehensive, sphere. And, in the narrower sphere of that community who accept the unspeakable gift, this same Divine grace gives all the blessed elements that blend into actual salvation. Thus, if there be any might of moral motive at all, there is no wonder that sanctification should be the result of the deliverance on the one hand from the malison of the broken law, and of the acceptance on the other of the benison of "grace upon grace."

V. 15. "What then?" (τί οὖν;) The Apostle has plunged into his subject, and in the fulness of might and mastery, is victoriously cleaving and clearing his way now on the right hand and now on the left. He asks What then? that is, What then should we do? What should we believers do? What, since we are not under the dominion of law, but under the dominion of grace?

"Shall we sin?" or rather, Should we sin? (No doubt we should read ἀμαρτήσωμεν with \aleph A B C D E K L P, not ἀμαρτήσομεν, shall we sin? with the Received or Elzevir Text). Should we go on sinning? Should we go on recklessly multiplying our sins, and thus increasing our sinning? Is that the way we should act, because, in virtue of the link of faith that unites us to Christ, "we are not under law but under grace." Notice the preposition under. They who are united to Christ by faith are, like others, under authority, but, unlike others, they are not under the reign of law, but under the reign of grace. Such is their new relation to the law, their Christian relation. It is peculiar; so peculiar that the law cannot now condemn them. It cannot pass sentence of condemnation against them because of their shortcomings. Believers in Christ are outside the sphere of the dominion of the law, so far as the determination of their everlasting destiny is concerned. The law has no authority to say to them in reference to its precepts, Do them or die. Believers are within the circuit of the realm and reign of grace, so that the good things, which God, in the fulness of His grace delights to give freely, are theirs. Forgiveness is theirs. Acceptance at the bar that is before the great white throne is theirs. Eternal life is theirs. Glory, honour, and immortality are theirs. All desirable things are theirs. "All things" that can be turned into heritage are theirs, so that they can triumphantly exclaim, "All things are ours, for we are Christ's." These blessings are all theirs, because they are no longer in the sphere and under the sway of the law, but in the sphere and under the merciful and jubilant sway of grace. Should we then, in consequence of our possession of all these blessings, go on sinning? Should our immunity from the malediction of sin be seized by us as a high tower of security into which we may run, and within which we may spend our energies in the indulgence of unrestricted revel and riot?

"God forbid" (μὴ γένοιτο). Far away from us be such wickedness and folly! The Apostle abhors the idea.

V. 16. But not content with the expression of the moral nausea which was stirred within him, the Apostle proceeds to reason against the idea.

"Know ye not, he says, that is, surely ye do know—that to whomsoever ye present yourselves as servants unto obedience, i.e. with a view to obedience—his servants ye are whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death—sin with the result of death—or of obedience unto righteousness—obedience with the result of righteousness."

"There may appear," says Dr. Chalmers, "a sort of unmeaning and uncalled-for tautology in this verse, a something not very close or consequential, and which it is difficult to seize upon" (Lectures on Romans, in loco). There is certainly no refined "wisdom of words," nothing of the nature of rhetorical artifice in the nice adjustment of clause to clause. But there is a great grappling with great ideas, and an earnest application of them to the conscience.

"Know ye not"? says he. He addresses his readers as if they were his hearers, ignoring the intervenience of pen and ink. And his address is not so much in the spirit of a philosophic theologian, as in the mood and manner of a practical moralist. He deals with them, and speaks very much as he would address and exhort, around the hearth of some home, a company of Christian friends. When he says, "Know ye not," he assumes that the idea, which he is about to emphasise, is really unchallengeable; and yet, as he correctly judges, it may be profitably considered, and considered iteratively and re-iteratively.

The drift of what he emphasises is this,—
When any ethical course of conduct is deliberately chosen and pursued, then the naturally retributive consequences necessarily stereotype themselves in the experience of the individual. If the course chosen be righteous, then the consequences within the sphere of consciousness are pleasant and tend to bliss. Whereas if the course of procedure be at variance with the absolutely perfect standard of righteousness, the absolutely perfect will, then the consequences in consciousness rasp sooner or later on the most sensitive elements in the heart of the being, and tend to terminate in penal disharmony and unspeakable distress.

The Apostle, however, brings out his idea in figurative form, and, when thus brought out, he handles it, not in the way of abstract propositions, but concretely in the way of thrusting the consideration of it home to the business and bosom of every one of his readers.

“To whomsoever ye present yourselves to be servants.” It is assumed that all men are servants and must be servants. They are under authority, whether they recognise the fact or not. No man is supreme in relation to himself. Every man has a master. While every man can choose, his elective range is strictly within limits; and according as he chooses, some Power or other beyond himself controls the effect of his choice. In choosing he may elect to be under the control of the one or the other of two opposing ethical principles. But between the two he must make choice. Both are master-principles so far as the ethical regulation of life is concerned. But they are moral contraries. The Apostle figuratively represents them as Lords or Masters. They rule the life so far as retribution is concerned.

Well, "to whomsoever ye present yourselves to be servants,"—i.e. to whichsoever of the two Masters ye consecrate the service of yourselves, "with a view to obedience," i.e. under the free determination to do what is in harmony with the regulative principle that has been chosen. The Apostle puts it figuratively and concretely thus,—“to whichsoever Master ye freely present yourselves to be servants with a view to habitual obedience.” Then he proceeds to aver that “his servants ye are whom ye obey.” There is only the appearance of tautology, for while it is one thing to offer or present oneself to be an obedient servant, it is another thing altogether, though intimately related, to be accepted as a servant for obedience and treated accordingly. It is one thing to choose your regulative principle, and another thing altogether to be retributively regulated by it when once it is chosen. Choice, and the retributive consequences of choice, are not to be confounded. Whatever the latter are, they are not human choices. “His servants ye are whom ye obey.” The master controls the life. And consequently whatever the character of the master, thus will the servants be treated. If the master be good, the treatment of the servants will be fair and benign. If the master be tyrannous and selfish and evil, his treatment of the servants will be tyrannical and oppressive.

Hence the Apostle adds, distinguishing the two opposing master-principles, "whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness." Such is the great ethical alternative; and it is final. Men must be servants either of sin or of obedience. In these ethical fundamentals there is no middle ground of neutrality. By obedience, which is in itself a neutral term applicable alike to the servants of sin and the servants of holiness, the Apostle here means obedience proper on the part of men, that is, obedience to goodness, and to the preceptive will of God. All other obedience, so called, obedience to that which is opposed to the will of God, is disobedience proper.

Men then are servants either of sin or of obedience. If of sin, the consequence is that they are dealt with according to the nature of the master. He gives his servants "wages" for their maintenance; but the wages are "death" (ver. 23). They are the destruction of the weal, peace, and bliss of the soul. If, on the other hand, men are the servants of obedience, and are thus controlled by the spirit of obedience, then they are treated according to the essential nature of obedience and righteousness, and thus of the righteous God, the holy, just, and good.

The Apostle's use of the word "obedience" is somewhat peculiar. We naturally look upon "obedience" as being the characteristic of a servant rather than of a master. But here it is itself the Master who is to be obeyed. There is perfect logical propriety in the representation. Obedience is the true antithesis of Sin, for sin is disobedience. Since sin, then, is one of the dominating principles, it is fitting that obedience should be the other. Men must either be obedient or sin. If they be voluntarily and deliberately characterised by "obedience," they will be treated according to the nature of that great and good regulative principle. They shall have a reward of bliss. But if they voluntarily and deliberately yield themselves to the service of disobedience, or sin, then they must submit to be dealt with according to the nature of the master to whom they have presented the service of their members.

There is not a direct antithesis between the expressions "sin unto death" and "obedience unto righteousness." A direct antithesis would be secured if we were to balance the clauses thus, "sin unto death" and "obedience unto life everlasting." But the Apostle is satisfied with the indirect mode of antithesis; and it affords him the opportunity of emphasising the idea of sanctification. Ethical obedience, when voluntarily and deliberately yielded to God, results in "righteousness." It is, says the Apostle, "unto righteousness."

V. 17. "But thanks be to God that ye were servants of sin." It is a peculiar expression, redolent of literary felicity. The Roman brethren had been servants of sin. But this unhappy servitude was now a thing of the past. "Troja fuit." It is as if the Apostle had said, "Ye were, but are not now, servants of sin." They had addicted themselves to the unholy service; and as a fitting penal consequence sin had dealt with them according to its immutably evil nature. It handled them roughly; and, domineering over them, caused them to suffer in their service, and caused them to suffer for their service. There is, whether men recognise it or not, something of ineradicable unrest, uneasiness, and sorrowfulness in sin. All wickedness has woe in its heart.

"God be thanked," says the Apostle, that your service to sin is past. He sees the hand of God in their emancipation. It did not work necessitatingly indeed, or violently or capriciously; yet it actually worked; graciously and compassionatingly and effectually. The Apostle was as thankful as if the whole blessing had been emptied into his own lap, and had been for his own special enjoyment and indeed for himself alone. God be thanked, i.e. let God be thanked; by you, my Roman brethren, and by me. It is my desire that thus God should be thanked.

It is meet that His working should be apprehended and appreciated.

"Ye obeyed from the heart the form of teaching into which ye were delivered." Here is the true reason for the thankfulness of the Apostle; and the reason why the Romans themselves should be actuated by intensity of gratitude. A revolution had taken place in their mode of life and in the ethical aims by which they were actuated. They had become, in their character, converted persons, and their conversion had been effected through the instrumentality of some peculiar kind of Divine evangelical "teaching."

The evangelical teaching referred to was of a certain "type." That is the word which is employed by the Apostle (τύπος). There was in the reality represented by the word a certain distinct impress, which stamped its similitude upon the recipient mind, and thus presented such bold outlines of evangelical idea as sufficed for the ethical transformation and transfiguration of the life. The impress, so far forth as incomplete reality would permit, expressed the essence of the gospel in its grand ethical potency. The Apostle signalises the result. The Roman brethren obeyed the type of teaching into whose educative influence they had been handed over. Hence their conversion; their holiness. It was a monument to the power of Divine instruction, even when that instruction was only partially developed.

It should not be assumed that in the expression the type of doctrine into which ye were delivered there is a reference to full-orbed evangelical truth, or to the gospel in its maturity. The Roman brethren in general had not enjoyed the privilege of detailed apostolic teaching. No apostle had ever visited them. But they had been taught the first great principles of Christianity; and they had turned to good account such incomplete teaching as they had enjoyed. Their type of teaching had been to a large extent a thing at second hand, or at some still farther remove from the primal source. In many departments of thought there would probably be numerous intervening links between what they themselves had heard on the one hand, and what had been elsewhere spoken by the lips of the apostles on the other.

But yet they had obeyed from the heart such type of doctrine as had been brought within their reach.

The construction of the sentence is somewhat irregular. The expression τύπον διδαχῆς exhibits a case of 'grammatical attraction.' Had it not been for the perturbation consequent on this attraction we might have expected the statement to have run thus, ὑπηκούσατε δὲ ἐκ καρδίας τῷ τύπῳ τῆς διδαχῆς εἰς ὃν παρεδόθητε.

The clause "into which ye were delivered" seemed so peculiar to our translators and Castellio and many other expositors, that they assigned to it an impossible construction and interpretation, rendering it which was delivered to you, instead of into which ye were delivered. The Apostle's idea, however, is, that his Roman brethren had been heartily obedient to the peculiar type of doctrine into whose educative influence they had, in the gracious Providence of God, been handed over. The result had been most satisfactory. By yielding themselves heartily to such teaching of the gospel as was within their reach, they remained no longer in the service of sin. The life they were now living in the flesh, in hope of the glory of God, was a new and holy life of determined antagonism to unrighteousness, and of devoted consecration to righteousness and to God.

Some critics, inclusive of Beza, Tholuck, Bishop Wordsworth, and Dr. Chalmers have supposed that, when the Apostle speaks of a type of teaching into which believers are delivered, he draws his figurative representation from metallurgy, and particularly from the casting or moulding of metals. Bishop Wordsworth gives the import of the passage thus: "You readily obeyed the mould of Christian faith and practice, into which at your baptism you were poured as it were, like soft, ductile, and fluent metal, in order to be cast and take its form. You obeyed the mould; you were not rigid and obstinate, but were plastic and pliant and assumed it readily." "The metaphor," he continues, "suggested itself to the Apostle in the city where he was writing this Epistle, Corinth, famous for casting statues, etc., in bronze." This interpretation evokes so vivid a representation of imagery that there is no wonder that it should have thrown a spell of fascination over numerous minds. But it is nevertheless an improbable exegesis. It is somewhat violent to represent believers as obeying, and obeying from the heart, a mould of teaching into which they were run. The idea of freedom is prominently involved in the conception of ethical obedience; but it is lost in the conception of a metallurgical casting into a mould. The Apostle thanks God that his Romans had obeyed. It would by no means have been an unparalleled case had they disobeyed. But the idea of such possible disobedience is obliterated the moment that we think of them as cast into a metallurgic mould.

V. 18. "And, being emancipated from sin, ye became devoted to the service of righteousness." (ἐλευθερωθέντες δὲ ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας ἐδουλώθητε τη δικαιοσύνη.) Such was the happy result of obeying the type of evangelical teaching into which they had been initiated. The fetters which sin had laid upon them were snapped, and they themselves, animated by the mightily constraining sympathy and love of the Redeemer, had "struck the blow." They ceased to work for sin. "Cease to do evil,—learn to do well," said God by the mouth of Isaiah the prophet. The Apostle's Romans followed out the Divine instruction. There is not any explicit reference to Divine redemption, or to a ransom, or to propitiation. These belong to different cartoons of representation, invaluable "for instruction" in their own places, but not requiring to be monopolisingly obtruded into every place. The peculiar experiences of the Apostle's Romans are here, so far as details are concerned, hidden behind the one great fact of their emancipation or freedom. They were free, and they knew it. They had been sin's servants; and as sin is a tyrant, they had been its slaves. In working for their cruel taskmaster they had been constrained to work in fetters, and under the uplifted rod of the oppressor. It was severely irksome work, as well as ignominious service. Figure apart, they had found in their conscious experience that sinning, even in its most defiant moods and revels, is wearisome work, unsatisfying, uncomfortable, full of heart-aches and of a sense of shame. "At last it is sure to bite like a serpent and to sting like an adder." Such had been the experience of the Roman believers in the days of their darkness and unbelief. But they came under the influence of "the truth that makes free," and, "being freed from the slavery of sin, they devoted themselves to the service of righteousness." Service of one kind or another was with them, as it is with all men, an ethical necessity. Man must serve, as we have again and again seen; but it is man's prerogative to choose his Master. The emancipated Romans freely gave themselves up to the service of "Righteousness."

The Apostle might have varied his pictorial representation. He might have represented the Master as Holiness, or as Obedience, or as Love, or as Goodness, or as God. The supreme Master is certainly God. But if the attention be withdrawn from the Infinite Personality, and turned instead to the consideration of the Master-principle in things ethical, then there may be the choice of any one of the other representations. The Apostle chooses Righteousness, a perfect impersonation of the Supreme Imperative within the conscience. They only are ethically "right," whose inner and outer demeanour is regulated by the dictates of "Righteousness." The entire career of our Saviour, who left us a spotless example, was a service of Righteousness.

V. 19. "I speak after the manner of men because of the infirmity of your flesh." (Ἀνθρώπινον λέγω διὰ τὴν ἀσθένειαν τῆς σαρκὸς ὑμῶν.) The Apostle, in view of what he had just been saying in the preceding verse, and of what he was about to add in the clauses that immediately follow, seems to have felt that his representations were far from being of the highest possible order of thought. They were not conceived and wrought out on the loftiest possible plane of pictorial embodiment. Hence he, as it were, apologises for them, and says, I speak what is human, I speak humanly (the expression is an instance of the adverbial accusative). It is assumed that there is a diviner style of thinking and speaking on such subjects. Man indeed, cannot, in his standpoints of thought, transcend his own atmosphere. His thoughts, subjectively considered, must be "human." But objectively contemplated, they may be flashes from above. God is a Revealer, and is constantly revealing to the percipient and recipient spirit. The more willing and docile the spirit may be, the more, and still the more will be the compass of the receptivity. The Apostle's receptivity was pre-eminently large. And to him "God made revelation through the Spirit" (1 Cor. ii. 10). "He had received," he tells us, "not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that he might know the things that are freely given to us by God" (1 Cor. ii. 12). When it was fitting, he could "speak wisdom among the perfect" (2 Cor. ii. 6). But many of his brethren were "babes in Christ," to whom "he could not speak as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal" (1 Cor. iii. 1). He had "to feed them with milk, not with meat" (1 Cor. iii. 2). Their intelligence was comparatively undeveloped on the ethical side of their understanding. Hence those rather homely and inæsthetic Presentations or Impersonations of service yielded to sin, to impurity, to lawlessness, on the one hand, and to righteousness, holiness, and obedience, on the other. Strictly speaking, there are no such masters. Strictly speaking, sin is not a tyrant, nor is a sinner the tyrant's slave. The true nature of sin cannot be understood unless in the light of volition and choice and freedom and responsibility. But such is the milk which the Apostle gave to his Roman brethren. M. le Cene seized the spirit, though he left the exact lines, of the Apostle's apologetic expression, when he rendered the parenthesis thus:—I speak 'popularly' because of the infirmity of your body.

The word body is not quite a happy substitute for the word flesh. The one did not entirely replace the other. And the Apostle having both the words before him (verse 6), chose flesh, for this reason among others—that more than body, it had got idiomatic attachments of ethical significance. The fundamental import, however, of both the terms is essentially identical. Men, in their higher relations, are apt to be repressed and oppressed, and kept from soaring aloft, by reason of the imperious earthward appetences of the incarnated condition. There is apt to be more of the animal than of the angel in human self-consciousness.

The phrase, infirmity of the flesh, means, not the infirmity attaching to, but the infirmity proceeding from, the incarnated condition. Webster says: "The genitive in its primary meaning appears to denote an object from which something proceeds" (N. Test. Syntax, p. 63).

The Apostle, it will be noted, does not say because of the infirmity of 'my' flesh, or even because of the infirmity of 'our' flesh. He could, no doubt, in other circumstances, have readily stooped to make such an abasement of himself. But at present he was strong in the consciousness of Divine illumination. He knew that he was taught by God. And he knew moreover that, as a matter of fact, he had been seeking out such representations as would be most easily apprehended, and most readily turned to practical account, by his brethren in Rome.

He proceeds to inculcate that species of service that is right and pure and noble; and he lays down for guidance the minimum measure of devotedness. He says, "for as ye presented your members servants to impurity and iniquity unto iniquity, so now present your members servants to righteousness unto holiness." (ὥσπερ γὰρ παρεστήσατε τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν δούλα τῇ ἀκαθαρσίᾳ καὶ τῇ ἀνομίᾳ εἰς τὴν ἀνομίαν, οὕτως νῦν παραστήσατε τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν δούλα τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ εἰς ἁγιασμόν.)

The Apostle, vaulting over the parenthesis which he had interposed at the commencement of the verse, betakes himself retrospectively to the statement made in verse 18, and consequently to that period of his brethren's experience in the time past of their lives, when they followed their own devices, and gave a preference to unrighteousness over righteousness. At that period they "presented their members servants to impurity, and to iniquity unto iniquity." The members of their body, in their tout ensemble, were abused by being devoted to the practice of moral evil. But there would be variety of degrees both in the quality and in the quantity of the evil. All moral evil is impurity. And all moral impurity is iniquity. It is lawlessness

(ἀνομία) in relation to the moral empire of God. There is such an ethical phenomenon as intensified and double-dyed iniquity; intensified and double-dyed impurity. There are degrees in impure thoughts, impure desires, impure intentions, impure words and works. All such impurities are in their entirety "impurity." And all moral impurity is factiousness, lawlessness, and rebellion in relation to God.

In times past the Apostle's Romans had unblushingly yielded up voluntarily the various members of their bodies as servants to sin. They knew that they had. The Apostle knew that they knew. And both he and they knew what had been the result of such bad and base devotement of themselves. It was certainly no very great enjoyment and "gaiety." It was simply "iniquity." They "yielded up their members to uncleanness, and to iniquity unto iniquity." That was the honest result. Almost all that was really pleasant in the "pleasures of sin" might have been enjoyed apart from sin's uncleanness and iniquity. Pleasure is one thing, sin itself is a totally different thing. It is not needful that they be commingled in order that the pleasure may be enjoyed. The pleasure may be had "neat." The happiness that is in riot and revelry might almost always be obtained without the riot and the revelry, without being associated with and contaminated by the presence of uncleanness. "Stolen waters are sometimes sweet;" but waters got without theft are sweeter still. The sweetness in the poisoned cup would be none the less, but all the more, if the poison were left out. The romp would be all the more delightful if the revel were eliminated. It was well, therefore, that the Apostle did not say, "Ye presented your members servants to impurity and iniquity resulting in a life of gaiety and pleasure." It is well that he said, "Ye presented your members servants to impurity and iniquity, resulting in iniquity." That, that, when the robe of illusion is stripped off, is the naked result. When impurity was chosen, sweet enjoyment was anticipated. But no. The vaticination of the fond heart was a false prophecy. The only result was iniquity. The sinner was left alone with his sin.

But the Apostle is referring to past impurity and iniquity unto iniquity, in order to set over against so dark a picture the brightness of the holy kind of life which he desired for his brethren in Rome and throughout the world. "So present your members to the service of righteousness unto holiness." We might have expected that he would have formulated the antithesis thus—"For as ye formerly presented your members to the service of impurity unto iniquity, so have ye now presented your members to the service of righteousness unto holiness." This affirmation of an actual historical fact is the kind of statement that we should have expected in confirmation of the assertion embodied in the 18th verse: "Being freed from sin, ye became servants of righteousness."

But the Apostle, in the second clause of the statement, which is his 'burden' in this 19th verse, lets stand aside all mere confirmatory affirmation, and strides forward in the spirit and mood of one who is the bearer of a grand ethical imperative (παραστήσατε); he strides forward till he stands face to face with his Romans, and unburdens his spirit in an emphatic injunction of sanctification. "Present now your members to the service of righteousness unto holiness." The desire of the Apostle's heart glowed into a white-heat of intensity to the effect that his fellow-believers should be walking, though at an unmeasured distance behind, in the footsteps of Him who was "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners"—sinners in the emphatic signification of the term.

V. 20. "For when ye were servants of sin ye were free in relation to righteousness." (ὅτε γὰρ δούλοι ἦτε τῆς ἀμαρτίας, ἐλείθεροι ἦτε τῇ δικαιοσύνῃ.)

Let the conjunctive for at the commencement of the statement be noted. It is the link that connects the contents of the verse with the contents of the second part of the preceding verse. The Apostle had just inculcated on his Romans the duty of presenting their members as "servants to righteousness unto holiness." And now, he adds, as confirmatory of his injunction, "for when ye were in the service of sin, ye were free in relation to righteousness." It is as if he had said, "I do well to urge upon you the service of righteousness unto holiness, for assuredly the very fact that formerly ye did nothing of the kind is a reason why you should improve your present opportunity."

The expression free in relation to righteousness is somewhat peculiar as meaning something evil, and consequently something that should not be. But we may learn from it, that it is not all freedom that is good. Freedom is a charming word. There is a sort of magic and bewitching glamour in it. The whole world loves it, and pants after the great reality of which it is the symbol. Nevertheless it is not all freedom that is good. In the expression "free in relation to righteousness," there is reference made to an evil freedom. When the Apostle's Romans were the servants of sin, they were "free from righteousness." They then possessed a rude, and wretched, and most undesirable freedom. Indeed, unlimited or absolute freedom is an impossibility to creatures; and to desire it is to desire the annihilation of a creature's condition. When, moreover, men enter into society, they are obliged, from the very essential nature of society, to part with portions of their freedom. In society every man is put, to a greater or less degree, under check by every other man, i.e. his freedom is curtailed. Now the freedom that could be enjoyed only at the expense of the blessings of society would be, not a blessed freedom, but undesirable and evil. The principle that is exemplified in society in general, is verified in all the minor societies that are included in general society. No man can enter any association whatsoever, political, ecclesiastical, economical, or literary, without paying away a part of his freedom, as the price of the benefits which the association has to offer. His connection with the association puts him more than he was before under check—it limits his freedom.

It is good for man to be thus put within limits as to freedom. Whether indeed it were good or not, it is indispensable; it is necessary. But nothing is necessary and indispensable to us that is not, all things considered, good. Man would be a creature absolutely wild, unsociable, reckless, dangerous, and, in one word, a pestilence and a nuisance, were he not to part with much of his freedom.

It is not all freedom, then, that is good. It is only such freedom as is consistent with our highest social, moral, and spiritual weal. Even the freedom wherewith Christ makes His people free is not unlimited in things spiritual and ecclesiastical. It is chiefly freedom from the penalty, freedom from the condemnation, and freedom from the defilement of sin. It is freedom the reverse of that license which unbelieving men cherish and assert, and which is signalised by the Apostle, when he says, in the words before us, "when ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness," i.e. ye were free in relation to righteousness, ye kept yourselves unengaged in reference to righteousness,—ye did not use your members in subordination to the behests of the master-principle of Righteousness. It is likewise worthy of being noticed, that as unbelievers experience freedom from righteousness only when they lay down their freedom in relation to sin, and yield themselves servants to sin; so whensoever any undesirable and evil freedom is experienced, it is invariably realised at the expense of freedom that is desirable and good. They who are free from righteousness are not free from sin. It is because they renounce their freedom in reference to sin, and yield themselves servants in reference to sin, that they are "free from righteousness." They again, who are "servants to righteousness," are free from sin. They have a blessed freedom. Human nature is so constructed that if a man will sacrifice some of the highest blessings of which he is susceptible, in order that he may not part with his freedom, he will, in the very sacrifice that he makes, bring himself under bondage to evils, and thus rob himself of a far nobler freedom than he retains. In our Public version—King James's—the phrase is rendered free from righteousness. Not quite felicitously, inasmuch as such a translation seems to suggest that righteousness has claims from which a man may be free. There is no such freedom.

The word free when employed in reference to servants and service, naturally enough denotes disengagement. While the Apostle's Romans were servants of sin, they were not engaged to righteousness. They were unengaged in relation to righteousness. They could not at the same time be servants both to Righteousness and to Unrighteousness. It is one of the old, old stories. "No man can serve two masters," when these masters are mutually antagonistic. The Apostle's Romans came under the sweep of the great Teacher's apophthegm, and so, at the bypast time referred to, they criminally held back their hand and their heart from engaging in the service of righteousness. The freedom they used was freedom abused.

V. 21. “What fruit then had ye at that time?” (τίνα οὖν καρπὸν εἶχετε τότε;) Note the connecting then. It intimates that the Apostle puts his query in view of the statement that goes immediately before, viz. that his Romans, in their former and unconverted state, had rendered no service of consecration to Righteousness. “What fruit then had ye at that time?” Note the word fruit. Its normal meaning is natural vegetable product. It is, of course, primarily a botanical term, and may, when peculiarly qualified, denote products that are deleterious, as well as products that are wholesome. Such outgrowths, however, are exceptional. The immense preponderance of fruits is good and salubrious, so that the word fruit, unless otherwise defined, limited, or qualified, naturally denotes that which is good and desirable for eating, or, it may be, what is positively delicious. “Unfruitful works of darkness” (Eph. v. 11), are not works utterly destitute of results, but works that are barren of beneficent or beneficial results. And in the case before us, the Apostle, in his survey, finds no outcome that is good. Hence his query

"What fruit had ye at that time?" Some critics conceive that the query is complete as it thus stands. What immediately follows (ἐφ' οἷς νῦν ἐπαισχύνεσθε) they regard as the answer to the query, "What fruitage then had ye? [Things] of which ye are now ashamed." This, as is evidenced by the punctuation of their texts, is the view taken by both Lachmann and Tischendorf. But it is more natural to postpone the interrogation point, so that the two clauses combined may form a single query, as in our public English Version and the Revision;—"What fruit then had you at that time [from those things] of which you are now ashamed?" Had you, in any of them, a single drop of pure enjoyment? Was the conscience ever satisfied? Was the heart? Such questions are pertinent. It is as if the Apostle had said, You never had any sweet fruit of happiness at all. How could you, when the blight of God's anathema was blowing into hurricane upon your vices? "For," says the Apostle, "the end of those things is death." (τὸ γὰρ τέλος ἐκείνων, θάνατος). By the word death he means something altogether different from, or at all events, something far more generic than natural decease, or the mere termination of terrestrial existence. There is ultimately indeed that termination in the case of all, whether good or evil, whether obedient or disobedient. But the existence, whithersoever transferred, and where-soever spent, is ever more than mere existence. It is existence in the midst of peculiar environment; existence with all the flowers of happiness culled out, or crushed down. It is existence over-run with unwholesomeness and weeds, or thick-strewn with thorns and thistles and other abominations. The death referred to is the penal destruction of well-being. That destruction is the natural termination and end of all shameful, and in particular of all shameless doings.

V. 22. “But now being emancipated from sin, and devoted to the service of God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life.” (ὡνι δὲ, ἐλευθερωθέντες ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας, δουλωθέντες δὲ τῷ Θεῷ, ἔχετε τὸν καρπὸν ὑμῶν εἰς ἁγιασμόν, τὸ δὲ τέλος ζωὴν αἰώνιον.) The great change, ever since you believed in the Lord Jesus, has established itself in your experience. “You are new creatures.” “Old things have passed away; behold all things have become new.” You are no longer the willing slaves of sin. You have become the willing servants of God, without a single ingredient either of slavery or reluctance in your service. In His service you enjoy your highest freedom, for the service of God has in it no element of constraint or compulsion, over-riding the willingness of the soul. As the result of such service, you have an outcome of fruit; you have your fruit, your fitting and normal fruit, ripening into richest result. It is fruit issuing in holiness. That is the ripest and richest result; and then the end of the whole life of probation and discipline on earth, is eternal life in glory, the endless life of bliss, that life which is at present "hid with Christ in God."

V. 23. "For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is life eternal in Jesus Christ our Lord."

The Apostle confirms the affirmation which he made in the preceding verse. Hence the reason-rendering "for." Man's future is retributive. It will be what it will be, in virtue of the man's peculiarity in things present. The future is begotten by the present.

The Apostle carries out his favourite impersonation. He paints into a picture his vivid ideas. Sin once more stands out objectively on his canvas as an evil master, a domineering lord, an absolute tyrant. The picture is an appropriate hieroglyph. There is something ineradicably savage in sin. Were it alive and self-conscious, it would feel itself taking pleasure in torturing and tormenting. Its ways are the blood-stained paths of relentless exaction and oppression. Wheresoever service is rendered, there will retribution be meted out according to the essential nature of the master who is served. The retribution earned by persisted-in sin, is the wages which the tyrant gives to his serfs. The Apostle has carried his pictorial idea as far as his pictorial imagery will stretch. Other masters give "wages" for the maintenance of their servants. Even the utterly selfish and unfeeling, who wield a mercilessly leaded lash, and who grudge the very rags that can be hung in tatters on the persons of their slaves; even these give supplies (ὀψώνια) to prolong the term of life, and thus the term of servitude. But sin has the bad pre-eminence of paying its serfs by punishing them. Its ὀψώνια—its wages—are death, and the death for which its counters are available, is the destruction of the weal of the soul.

Such is the retribution of those who persist in sinning. Such is the lurid gloom of the picture which is held up for inspection and reprobation. A voice says "look on this side and on that." But contrariwise when we turn, and look, not on that, but on this, the contrast picture, we see with a feeling of ethical elevation, and of "joy unspeakable," that the retribution of the believing, their 'award' and 'reward,' is overarched with a Divine glory. God, the Divine Master, does not give wages (ὁψώνια) at all; or, if He does, then His liberal wages, ere they pass from His full hand into the empty hands of His faithful servants, become transfigured into something better far. He gives, out of His own unpurchasable munificence, a free gift of bliss. It is "life everlasting." It is happiness perennial and eternal. It was the reward of Jesus, after He finished His work in agony and woe, and was buried, and then rose again and ascended. It is still the unexhausted and inexhaustible reward which Jesus is enjoying, and will enjoy for ever and ever. The same reward is ours, the moment that union with Christ is ours. Let any man be so closely united to Christ, that "to him to live is Christ" day after day of his probationary existence, and then there is no evil influence in all the Universe that can separate him from the love of God. "Eternal life is his in his Lord Jesus Christ."

APPENDIX.

I.

ADDITIONAL NOTES ON ROMANS VI. 14.

IN Romans vi. 14, the Apostle brings to view a peculiar relationship of those who have received the gospel. He says, "Sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under Law but under Grace."

"Over you"—you, that is to say, who have welcomed into your hearts the gospel.

How could the Apostle so express himself, when he was prepared to say in the 1st verse of the next chapter, "Know ye not, brethren, that the law has dominion over the man as long as he lives?"

To what law does he refer?

It is well to bear in mind that in the Apostle's writings the term has a somewhat varied range of reference. It sometimes denotes the whole of the Old Testament Revelation. Most appropriately so, for that Revelation was really, in its sum-total, an Authoritative Revelation of the will of God.

Sometimes the word denotes that portion of the Old Testament Revelation which is comprised in the Pentateuch.

Sometimes the Psalms and the Prophets are added, in thought, to the Pentateuch, and then all together constitute one complex Law.

Sometimes there is a condensation of the reference, representing at one time the essential duty of man as man, or more expansively, at another, the duties, prerogatives, and privileges of Jewish men as Jews.

The Apostle, in using the term, employs it as a great and comprehensive thinker might be expected to employ it, realising the complexity involved in its unity. He hence contemplates the complex object at very various angles of vision. And, as was not unnatural, he frequently shifts his standpoint, moving rapidly round the object of his contemplation, and looking at it in a succession of its manifold aspects. Unless we bear in mind that, in speaking of the Law, the Apostle was thus dealing with a many-sided unity, we shall be often perplexed when we try to follow in the train of his discussions.

It is demonstrable that in Romans vi. 14, and in Romans vii. 1 and 6, the Apostle refers to the Law, viewed as an Authoritative Revelation of the will of God in reference to man, as man. He is, in other words, referring to the Law in that one central aspect of its entirety, which is frequently, and excellently, designated the Moral Law. It is the Decalogue, i.e. the ten words or ten commandments. Or it is the duologue, i.e. the two words, the two commandments:—Supreme-love-to-God, and Love-to-our-neighbour-such-as-we-bear-to-ourselves.

That it is the decalogue or duologue that is referred to in the passages before us, is evidenced by Romans vii. 7—"What shall we say then? Is the Law sin? Away with that thought (Μὴ γένοιτο)! I had not known sin but through the Law; for I had not known coveting except the Law had said, Thou shalt not covet." The Apostle's quotation points to the law he had been signalling, and identifies it as distinctly and demonstratively as his reference in Chapter xiii. 8, 9, where he says, "Owe no man anything but to love one another; for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the Law." What Law?

The Decalogue; for the Apostle goes on to say—"For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet, and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this word, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

Assuming that the reference of the word Law is as indicated, what does the Apostle mean when he speaks of this Law as "having dominion over a man"? He means that it has executive power to deal with the man as he deserves. It is not the case that the Apostle looked upon the Law as utterly powerless; defunct; a dead letter; dead or dying. It has dominion. It is alive and has power. It can lord it over the man who is subject to it; and it does so lord it. So that it still has strength. It is the very Law that is signalised by the Apostle in 1 Corinthians xv. 56, "The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the Law." It is the Law that gives strength to whatsoever there is in death that has a sting. Were it not for the Law, sin would be no sin; and consequently there would be no sting in death. "Sin is the transgression of the law." The Law then still is; and has strength, and exercises it, and dominion, and lordship.

But if this be the case, what is meant when it is said in verse 6, "But now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held." Is there not, it may be asked, a reference in this latter expression to the Law? And if so, is it not expressly represented as dead?

In our English Version, King James's, the Law does seem unfortunately to be represented as dead. But in the Original Greek, as is acknowledged by all enlightened critics, without exception, it is not the Law that is represented as dead. It is believers in Jesus. The true translation of the Apostle's expression is given in the margin of our English Bibles, "But now we are delivered from the Law, being dead to that wherein we were held," that is, having died and being dead to the Law.

It is believers in Jesus who have died; not the Law. And believers are "dead," not in any dreadful sense of the term. They have died in Christ, and are dead in Christ. They "have been crucified with Christ." They died with the crucified Christ. Believers occupy, with respect to sins, the same relation which Jesus Himself now occupies. He, having died under our sins, and for them, bearing their penalty and exhausting it, "dieth no more." He is now, and for ever, free, as our Substitute, from all farther claims from the dishonoured Law—He is free from all farther liability to suffer. "Christ being raised from the dead, dieth no more." Death has no more dominion over Him. In His resurrection-life He "liveth unto God"—He liveth in the full enjoyment of the glorious smile of the countenance of God—a countenance that, to Him, shall never more be over-shadowed or beclouded. The darkness is past for ever. The Apostle adds—"Likewise, reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed to sin, and alive to God." It is thus decisively evidenced that it is not the Law that is dead, but believers, who by faith enter into Christ. Becoming parts of His person, they die in His death, and live in His life.

As regards the translation that is given in King James's English Version, "that being dead wherein we were held," its history is a little romance.

The translation rests on no manuscriptural authority whatsoever.

How then did it get itself admitted into the Elzevir Greek Testament, and into our Public English Version? By Beza's unconscious influence.

Beza misunderstood some statements of Erasmus in reference to some statements of Chrysostom. He says, "Erasmus being witness, Chrysostom read ἀποθανόντος (Legit igitur Chrysostomus ἀποθανόντος, Erasmo teste). It was a mistake. But Beza, having the courage of his opinions, added, "I so approve of the reading that I do not hesitate to replace it in the text." So it got a place, not in his Annotations only, but likewise in the text, which, in all his five editions, he places at the head of the pages. Our English Mill relieved a little his literary animus by saying, "This Annotator 'dared' to put the word into the body of the Apostolic text" (invitis nostris libris omnibus in corpus textus Apostolici referre ausus est hic Annotator). PROLEGOMENA cxxxi. Before the Geneva critic ventured, indeed, on the final step of elevating the mere creature of his imagination into the text, he contrived to convince himself—though in utter default of evidence—that what he fancied to be Chrysostom's reading must have been the universally accepted reading of the age (omnino apparet eam lectionem fuisse tum sine controversia receptam). Thus he piled blunder upon blunder, and showed himself—peculiarly strong as he doubtless was—to be weak as other men.

Several editors followed in the wake of the Elzevirs, such as Courcelles, Leusden, Schöttgen, etc. They followed blindly, however, though reverentially—not dreaming that they were presenting, as a portion of the inspired text, a reading which rests on no foundation whatever but a misunderstanding of a remark of Chrysostom. Of course Mill lifted up his protest. So did Bengel. Wetstein also, although, in accordance with his plan, he allowed the false word to remain in the text. He prefixed to it his reprobating brand. Griesbach dismissed it; and so do Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, Westcott-and-Hort, not to speak of the minor editors. Muralto fancied that ἀποθανόντος was the reading of the Vatican. But the Vatican reads ἀποθανόντες, as does the Sinaitic. And so do all the Greek Fathers, who comment on the passage, or who quote it. There is not a speck of manuscriptural authority for ἀποθανόντος. And yet so great a man as Grotius got completely bemeshed in considering the Apostle's expression. He assumed in the first place that there was manuscriptural authority for ἀποθανόντος, and, on the basis of this assumption, he asserts the existence of the authority (alii codices habent ἀποθανόντος). He appeals, in the second place, to Chrysostom as having had that particular reading before him. And, in the third place, he says that Origen too makes mention of the reading (cujus lectionis et Origenes meminit), whereas Origen does nothing of the kind. So far as his mind can be gathered from Rufinus's Version—the only existing means for ascertaining his opinion—he mentions the reading that is reproduced in the Vulgate, the Itala or Older Latin, the Latin Fathers in general, and, in particular, in the manuscripts D E F G, (Scio et in aliis exemplaribus scriptum a lege mortis in qua detinabimur; sed hoc, id est, mortui, et verius est et rectius); but he does not make the shadow of a reference to Beza's reading. (See Opera, vol. iv. p. 179.)

Grotius is one of those who suppose that the Law is dead. "Christ," says he, "in dying slew the law of Moses." Hence he construes the last clause of the 1st verse thus: "The law has dominion over a man as long as it lives." Wycliffe was of the same opinion. So too Erasmus, Tyndale, Vatable. Este too, and Bengel were of the same mind. Mace likewise, and Doddridge, Taylor of Norwich, Wakefield, Newcome, Belsham, Koppe, Platt, etc. But the great body of expositors, including Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, Ecumenius; Luther too, and Melancthon, and Calvin, as well as all the chiefs of modern exegesis, construe the passage as the authors of our Public Version have done, as well as their successors, the late Revisionists. "Dieser Ansicht," as says Rückert, "sind die neusten Ausleger sammt und sonders beigetreten."

Even Beza saw that it would be utterly at variance with the scope of the paragraph to suppose that the life of the law is referred to. And, while contending that the Apostle says in verse 6th, "That being dead, wherein we were held," he yet does not suppose with Doddridge, Wakefield, Belsham, etc., that the Apostle meant the law being dead. He supposed that the meaning is, that thing—sin—being dead. He was persuaded that Paul never could say that the law of God is dead. (Atqui Paulus nunquam, opinor, dicturus fuit legem Dei mortuum.) He was right. The death of the law is an idea altogether foreign to the theology of Paul, and to the theology of all the inspired writers.

LITERATURE ON ROMANS VI.

THOUGH there is little Literature of a special description, bearing on the elucidation of Romans vi, still there is 'a little.' The Chapter has had, all along, a somewhat peculiar, but yet somewhat perplexing charm for such theological scholars as combined, in prominent degree, a spirit of moral earnestness with a taste for literary culture. Hence in the age of Academic Dissertations, Exercitations, Prolusions, and 'Commentations,' not infrequently was there recourse to Romans vi, as affording congenial material for able or elegant, as also for able and elegant, monographs on groups of verses, or even on single clauses and expressions. Among these

Academic Monographs, I have met with, and possess, the following :—

Jo. Conrad Anenmüller : Quæstio Theologica utrum Mors Christo dominata fuerit ? Occasione Rom. vi. 9. (1688).

Jo. Conrad. Bauck : Dissertatio Theologica de Morte quæ justificat a peccato. Rom. vi. 7. (1767). An able and exhaustive Treatise.

G. Besenbeck : De stilo gentium doctoris Paulli ad omnium hominum captum adcommodato. Occasione Rom. vi. 19. (1759).

G. Besenbeck : Commentatio theologica exegetica de fervido Christianorum Deo et Justitiæ sub libertatis lege serviendi studio. Occasione Rom. vi. 19. (1760).

Fr. Kornmann : Dissertatio exegetica de Typo apostolicæ doctrinæ digne recepto ac porro recipiendo. Ex epistola ad Romanos vi. 17. (1730).

And. Michaelis : De Morte ac Vita fidelium cum Christo, ex Rom. vi. 8. (1703).

Aug. H. Niemeyer : Commentatio in locum Paullinum ad Rom. vi. 1-11. (1788).

Michael C. Süsserott : Exercitatio theologica de quotidiana Christianorum morte et resurrectione. Ex epistola ad Romanos, vi. 4, 8, et reliq. (1711).

J. Fr. Winzer : Explanatur locus Paulli ad Romanos epistolæ cap. vi. 1-6. (1831). Eminently scholarly.

A special niche among the Monographs should be assigned to the first half of James Fraser's Treatise entitled The Scripture Doctrine of Sanctification. His explication of the sixth Chapter may, for our present purpose, be detached from that of the seventh. The exegesis, though somewhat cumbrous in style, is massive, and judicious. The devoted author, minister at Alness in Ross-shire, died in 1769. His life's lot, at the commencement of his career, was cast in troublous times.

PRESS NOTICES.

"Contemporary Review."

We have found Dr. MORISON a very able expositor. He has a sound judgment, great capacity for criticism, and immense industry.

The "Rock."

Its criticisms are keen, well sustained, and never feeble or puerile; while no difficulty of text or interpretation is ever shrunk from. Dr. MORISON's Commentary gives evidence of the best qualities of a scholar and a divine; and it is a work which we recommend to all theological students as giving very valuable aid, to be sought in vain elsewhere.

The "Sword and Trowel."

No student can well do without it. It is a marvellous display of learning and labour.

The "London Quarterly Review."

This is, on the whole, the most wise, exhaustive, and serviceable Commentary on Matthew which we have yet seen.

LONDON: HODDER AND STOUGHTON, 27, PATERNOSTER ROW.

The "Expositor."

Our opinion of this masterly work, the value we put on it is well known. It was, in our judgment, the best Commentary on St. Matthew's Gospel a dozen years ago; and, despite the almost incredible advance in the art and practice of exposition which has been witnessed since then, it remains the best to this day.

"Scotsman."

To come down to recent times, the venerable Dr. JAMES MORISON has, in his Commentaries on Matthew and Mark, exhibited a deeper insight into gospel history than any living expositor, native or foreign.

"United Presbyterian Magazine."

We have seldom dipped into any exegetical performance with more pleasure. Our admiration has been excited by the displays of learning, acuteness, and lively imagination, combined with devoutness, which mark every page. We feel that we are in the hands of an independent and original thinker, and that under his guidance we are really adding to the stock of our knowledge in the things of the Spirit.

The "Methodist Recorder."

On the whole, Dr. MORISON's Commentaries on the Gospels of Matthew and Mark are the best we know.

The "Record."

"Dr. MORISON's Commentary on the first of the Gospels was highly recommended in the Record as scholarly, exhaustive, and thoroughly devout. We are able with much satisfaction to recommend the work before us—Commentary on Mark—as marked with much ability. Dr. MORISON is evidently a divine of no ordinary erudition. His expositions, characterized by common sense and sound judgment, are evangelical and edifying; and the theological student will especially value the combination of patience, critical sagacity, and fairness.

The "Nonconformist."

Not only has he studied the great commentaries, ancient and modern, on the Scripture he takes in hand; he has also studied the voluminous dissertations that have been written on single and often minute points of interpretation. He has digested what he has read; and is not content to give other men's views, but also gives both his own, and his reasons for forming them. He has the rare gift of common sense in singular perfection.

A CRITICAL EXPOSITION OF THE THIRD CHAPTER OF PAUL'S EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS: A Monograph.

8vo, cloth, price 12s. 6d.

"The work is marked by much ability. The author's erudition is uncommonly extensive. He has abundance of Greek and Hebrew learning, and is familiar with technical theology in its minutest details. Nor have his accumulated stores of knowledge weighed down his brains so that they are incapable of thinking. On the contrary, the author is metaphysical and acute. He can criticize the great masters of exegesis that have preceded him, bringing a clear intellect to bear upon their expositions, and subjecting their opinions to a minute analysis. As an example of exhaustive exposition the volume is unique in these days." "Every verse and every word are canvassed; while the opinions of many writers upon these words and verses are fairly given." "The multifarious reading and intellectual vigour of the author show that he is peculiarly gifted. In the great majority of instances in which he enters into elaborate investigations of special words or phrases, we agree with his conclusions; admiring, all the while, his patient consideration and calm judgment. A scholar must produce cogent reasons for dissenting from the views at which the author has arrived through inductive processes, indicative of much labour, reading, and thought."—Athenæum.

"We regard the work, on the whole, as a rare specimen of most varied research, combined with independent judgment and critical sagacity; of minute acquaintance with the opinions of others, accompanied with a severe analysis of their merits; of linguistic aptitudes united with logical power, and intellectual vigour. Dr. Morison possesses a far greater number of the qualifications requisite for a satisfactory explanation of Scripture than most of his fellow-labourers in the same field."—British Quarterly Review.

"See generally the thorough defence of the forensic meaning of δικαιοῦσθα in the New Testament, supported from classic authors, and from the Old Testament,—in Morison, p. 163 ff."—The late H. A. W. Meyer, of Hannover (in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, vol. i. p. 161).

"Morison's monograph on Romans iii. is, as it seems to me, a unique specimen of learning and sound exegetical judgment."—Dr. F. Godet, Neuchâtel (in his Introduction to his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, vol. i. p. 117).

STUDIES ON THE NEW TESTAMENT. By F.

GODET, D.D., Professor of Theology, Neuchatel. Edited by the Hon. and Rev. W. H. LYTTTELTON, M.A., Canon of Gloucester. Seventh Edition. 7s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—The Origin of the Four Gospels.—Jesus Christ.—The Work of Christ.—The Four Chief Apostles.—The Apocalypse.

“We have not had in our hands for some considerable time a book so fresh, full, and suggestive. The author holds a high place in the higher biblical criticism; he has rich gifts, deep spiritual insight, and a remarkable method of saying a great deal in a sentence or two.”—Primitive Methodist.

STUDIES ON THE OLD TESTAMENT. By F.

GODET, D.D. Edited by the Hon. and Rev. Canon LYTTTELTON, M.A. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—Angels.—The Plan of the Development of Life on our Earth.—The Six Days of Creation.—The Four Greater Prophets.—The Book of Job.—The Song of Songs.

“Unquestionably M. Godet is one of the first, if not the very first, of contemporary commentators. We have no hesitation in advising all students of the Scripture to procure and to read with careful attention these luminous essays.”—Literary Churchman.

A COMMENTARY ON THE FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS. By THOMAS CHARLES EDWARDS,

M.A., of Lincoln College, Oxford, Principal of the University College of Wales, Aberystwith. Second Edition. 8vo, 14s.

“It is not often that a commentator puts himself, on his first appearance, into the front rank of a distinguished class; but it is no exaggeration to say this of the writer of the present work. In grammatical criticism and interpretation of the line of thought alike, the work is solid and strong. The acuteness of philological criticism is worthy of a scholar of the Master of Balliol, and reminds us, more than any other recent work, of Meyer. The exposition of the substantive teaching of the epistle is equally thorough. No difficulties are shirked. The crucial phrases and passages are ably discussed.”—London Quarterly Review.

THE PARABOLIC TEACHING OF CHRIST. A

Systematic and Critical Study of the Parables of Our Lord. By Rev. Prof. A. B. BRUCE, D.D. Second Thousand. 8vo, 12s.

“The volume should have a place next Trench on the Parables on the shelves of every student of the New Testament. It is one of the most valuable contributions to the study of the words of Christ that has appeared of late years. The treatment of what Professor Bruce calls ‘Parable-germs,’ or the undeveloped parables of such gnomic expressions, ‘They that be whole have no need of a physician,’ etc., or of such similes as that of the builders on the rock and on the sand, is rightly undertaken in connection with the more elaborated pictures of the parables properly so called.”—Academy.

THE EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS. Its Doctrine and Ethics. By R. W. DALE, LL.D., M.A., of Birmingham.
Third Thousand. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"These admirable lectures. The terse and vigorous style, rising on occasion into a manly and impressive eloquence, of which Mr. Dale is well known to be a master, gives lucid expression to thought that is precise, courageous, and original."—Spectator.

THE JEWISH TEMPLE AND THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. A Series of Discourses on the Epistle to the Hebrews. By the same Author. Seventh and Revised Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The treatment is quite worthy of the preacher's great reputation. His skill is equally remarkable in dealing with critical questions, in setting forth the meaning of the text, in enforcing Christian doctrine, and in educing practical lessons."—Contemporary Review.

NATURAL LAW IN THE SPIRITUAL WORLD.

By HENRY DRUMMOND, F.R.S.E., F.G.S. Fiftieth Thousand. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"This is one of the most impressive and suggestive books on religion that we have read for a long time. No one who reads the papers entitled 'Biogenesis,' 'Degeneration,' 'Eternal Life,' and 'Classification,' to say nothing of the others in this volume, will fail to recognise in Mr. Drummond a new and powerful teacher; impressive, both from the scientific calmness and accuracy of his view of law, and from the deep religious earnestness with which he traces the working of law in the moral and spiritual sphere. We would most strongly commend his present volume to the attention of all who wish to see religious questions treated with wide knowledge and profound earnestness."—Spectator.

"We have no hesitation in saying that this is one of the most able and interesting books on the relations which exist between natural science and spiritual life that has appeared. Mr. Drummond writes perfect English; his ideas are fresh, and expressed with admirable felicity."—Literary Churchman.
